Gazettes, which most People look on as Trifles, are really the most difficult kind of compositions that have appear'd. They require a very extensive acquaintance with the languages, and all the terms thereof; a great easiness and command of writing, and relating, things cleanly, and in a few words.

To write a gazette, a man should be able to speak of war both by land and sea; be thoroughly acquainted with everything relating to geography, the history of the time, and that of the noble families; with the several interests of princes, the secrets of courts, and the manners and customs of all nations.

Preface

In his work on the first decades of Dutch newspaper publishing, Dutch Corantos: 1618–1650, the Swedish bibliographer Folke Dahl stated that the compilation of a complete bibliography of early Dutch newspapers “is definitely impossible [Dahl’s italics]”. Dahl’s pessimism was framed by the destruction of the Second World War, which had delayed the publication of his own work and caused the permanent loss of much of Europe’s cultural heritage—presumably many early newspapers among them. Still, Dahl persisted that his work “might, in spite of all its shortcomings, be of some use to the future student.”

It was with these final words in mind that I started work on a bibliography of Dutch and Flemish newspapers of the seventeenth century. I first encountered these newspapers through the work of Dahl, in the summer of 2013. Dutch Corantos contains 334 facsimiles of some of the first Dutch newspapers, published in the 1610s and 1620s. Flipping through the pages I was struck by the neatly-set columns of news reports, the thick black letter typefaces, the minuscule headers, the disjointed style and the sober narrative. At first they seemed distant and opaque. Seventeenth-century newspapers are certainly a far cry from modern broadsheets or webpages; yet there was something fascinating about the window offered by these newspapers onto the diplomacy, conflicts and tribulations of the early modern period. The newspapers remained at the back of my mind until I was given the chance to document hundreds of seventeenth-century newspapers in Brussels and Bruges the following January. Several years on, and thousands of newspapers later, I like to think that these early newspapers are not so distant after all. This present work is in many ways a means to satisfy my own curiosity; and an attempt to bring to the attention of the wider scholarly world the curiosities thrown up by these ephemeral sheets of paper.

My objective with this bibliography is to offer a complete overview of all known surviving copies of seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish newspapers, in the hope of stimulating further discoveries and providing a general overview of titles, many of which are unknown, neglected, or misunderstood. Part one offers an essay on the seventeenth-century press in the Low Countries, followed by a statistical overview in several appendices. The non-Dutch reader will also find for their convenience four seventeenth-century Dutch newspapers translated in full, which I hope communicate a sense of the style and content of the genre. Part two of this work presents detailed information on forty-nine newspapers and news serials, composed of 16,232 surviving issues spread across eighty-four libraries, archives, museums and private collections in thirteen countries. The bibliographical data is preceded by prose introductions for each individual newspaper, which, I hope, will offer the reader a sense of the tone, content, publication history and social context of each title.

This is a project which would have been impossible to undertake on one’s own. I have amassed immense debts to numerous people and institutions, and received countless instances of advice and suggestions from friends and colleagues. Naturally, any errors that remain in this work are my own.

This work is built on the foundations constructed by many scholars over the past century and a half. I wish to single out René Vos, Otto Lankhorst and Ingrid Maier for their exceptional research across Europe’s libraries, searching endlessly through seventeenth-century correspondence, archives and book collections in the hope of finding a few newspaper issues tucked away at the bottom of a pile of loose papers. Such quests come with many pleasures and frustrations, and I have been honoured to follow in their footsteps. Ingrid Maier is one of the most generous scholars I have encountered, and she provided me with many valuable notes and annotations on her findings of the last twenty years. I wish also to thank Alex Alsemgeest, Helena Backman and Judith Brouwer for tips on stray newspaper issues tucked away in archival collections in Sweden and England. Louis Nierynck, M.J. Meijgaard and Ton van Ijzendoorn graciously allowed me to take notes on the newspapers in their private collections, and went as far to send me photocopies and digital scans of their holdings. Erik Geleijns very kindly sent me scans of a run of Abraham Verhoeven’s Nieuwe Tijdinghen in the Museum Meermanno in The Hague.

During my research in Europe’s libraries and archives I was made to feel at home by many friends. In particular I wish to thank Goran Proot at the Bibliothèque Mazarine in Paris; Hendrik Defoort, Régine Dedecker and Frank Vanlangenhove at the Universiteitsbibliotheek in Ghent; Johan de Zoete and Henno Zelis-Enschedé at the Noord-Hollands Archief in Haarlem; Wolfgang Undorf at the Kungliga Biblioteket in Stockholm; Steven van Impe at the Erfgoedbibliotheek Hendrik Conscience in Antwerp; Helen McGinley and Simon Lang at Trinity College Library in Dublin; and Anton van der Lem and Kasper van Ommen at the Universiteitsbibliotheek in Leiden. I am also deeply grateful to the staff of the following institutions for their assistance: Algemeen Rijksarchief (The Hague), Archives Générales du Royaume (Brussels), British Library (London), Bibliothèque nationale de France (Paris), Bodleian Library (Oxford), Erfgoed Leiden en Omstreken (Leiden), Felixarchief (Antwerpen), Haags Gemeentearchief (Den Haag), Houghton Library (Harvard), Koninklijke Bibliotheek van België (Brussels), Koninklijke Bibliotheek (The Hague), Museum Plantin-Moretus (Antwerp), Persmuseum (Amsterdam), Groninger Archieven (Groningen), Stadsarchief (Amsterdam), Stadsarchief (Ghent), Stadsbibliotheek (Bruges), The National Archives (Kew), Trezoar (Leeuwarden), Het Utrechts Archief (Utrecht), Universiteitsbibliotheek (Amsterdam), and Universitetsbibliotek (Uppsala). Staff at several of the above institutions were very generous to allow me to reproduce images from their collections in this bibliography. I also wish to thank the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam for making their rich collections available in the public domain.

Staff at other institutions not named above, which I was unable to visit myself, made available to me scans of their seventeenth-century newspapers; and made considerable efforts to describe them in their catalogues. Here the powers of the digital age have afforded me luxuries unavailable to past scholars. This is most evident in the creation of Delpher, the first digital database of Dutch newspapers, which contains scans of thousands of seventeenth-century newspapers. Thanks to the contributing institutions and the staff at the Koninklijke Bibliotheek in The Hague who have produced the database, Delpher shortened many lengthy and expensive research trips, and allowed me to compare directly duplicate issues of newspapers stored in Stockholm, Paris, Oldenburg and Moscow—often revealing intricate differences between the copies.

Most of this work was compiled in St Andrews, where I have had the fortune to find a true home. This is first and foremost due to the community of friends and colleagues who have supported, embraced and realised this project. I know of no history faculty where such generosity and kindness is a daily norm. I wish to thank all the members of the Reformation Studies Institute, and in particular the staff and volunteers of the Universal Short Title Catalogue Project. I shared many happy hours with Nina Lamal and Jan Hillgaertner discussing early modern newspapers, and I am obliged for their valuable advice. Jan also photographed and requested scans of hundreds of newspapers in Stockholm and Wolfenbüttel, an act of generosity for which I am deeply grateful. Lucas Kriner drew and composed the maps with characteristic expertise and kindness. For their friendship and company I thank also Will Tonks, Tom Durden, Edwin Goi and Drew Thomas. In Amsterdam, Hans de Witt has always been the most welcoming host one could ever imagine; my trips back and forth across the Channel were realised by his indulgence. I have received countless suggestions and comments from Professor Udo Brinkman, which, as always, contributed significant improvements to this work. At Brill I wish to thank Francis Knikker and Wilma de Weert for their enthusiastic assistance.

This work would never have appeared but for three wonderful friends. Arjan van Dijk is the most convivial and generous publisher one could hope for; his confidence and wholehearted support were crucial to the fulfilment of this project. Graeme Kemp offered endless hours to manage and support the bibliographical documentation of this work. His vision and expertise realised many of the interpretations offered in the following pages. Andrew Pettegree guided this project from inception to end. You would not be holding this book were it not for his rare munificence and character.

To Fran, for her companionship and wisdom I am immeasurably grateful. She has guided this present work, and all its discoveries, bedevilmments and vanities, with endless charm and affection. It would be much the less without her.

Dit boek is voor Timo, Anne-Marie, Dagmar en Victor—voor alles.

Conventions

The term “newspaper” is used to define a printed news product with the following four main features: periodicity (it must appear frequently and on a regular basis); contemporaneity (the news must be new); miscellany (it must contain a wide scope of news from different places), and public availability. I use the term “news serial” when a printed news product is a serial venture which does not adhere to strict periodicity or miscellany.

Throughout this work I use interchangeably the terms “courantier”, “newspaperman”, and “newspaper publisher” to refer to the proprietor/publisher of a newspaper. Sometimes the printer of a newspaper was also the publisher of the newspaper—it is always made clear if this is the case. Often the publisher was also the primary distributor, but sometimes a separate individual was appointed to manage sale of the copies. In all cases, the proprietor/publisher referred to is the individual who owns the licence or privilege to publish the newspaper. Many newspaper publishers occupied the position of stadsdrukker; this was a position introduced by municipal authorities who granted a publisher special privileges and often a salary, for which the publisher was required to produce all printed ordinances and announcements for the authority in question.

All dates given are in the Gregorian (New Style) calendar, unless otherwise specified. In the seventeenth century the Gregorian calendar was the standard calendar in the western provinces of the Dutch Republic (Holland and Zeeland), and all of the Southern Netherlands.

Modern English place names are used for all geographical locations. This includes the modernisation of former German towns located today in Eastern Europe, with the exception of the following four: Danzig (now Gdańsk), Königsberg (now Kaliningrad), Breslau (now Wrocław) and Stettin (now Szczecin). I also use Constantinople instead of Istanbul.

All monetary values are given in Dutch guildens of 40 pounds, unless otherwise specified. The Dutch gulden divided into 20 stuivers; each stuiver divided into 8 duiten or 16 penningen. Most Dutch and Flemish newspapers cost 1 or 2 stuivers per issue; a year’s subscription for a weekly newspaper in the first half of the seventeenth century was around 3 gulden. The average daily wage of a labourer in the seventeenth-century Dutch Republic was around 16–20 stuivers. The average income of a Dutch household in the seventeenth century was around 500 gulden.

Newspapers in the Low Countries and the Study of the Periodical Press

No one, who in any way engages with the world, by which I mean, with essential worldly events, affairs, and businesses ... is ignorant of how expedient and useful so-called couranten or newspapers are ... and due to the value of newspapers it is possible in all countries of Europe, and even further afield, to publish newspapers with permission from the high regents, so that everyone can buy and read them, and hear what goes on in the world.<sup>1</sup>

With these words the writer Johann Hermann Knoop (1706–1769) opened his Dutch guide to newspaper reading, published in 1758. Knoop's guide was printed and sponsored by Abraham Ferwerda, the first newspaper publisher in the northern Dutch city of Leeuwarden. Ferwerda hoped to encourage sales in his native town with this lofty account of the many political and cultural benefits of subscribing to a newspaper. The guide was a publicity stunt rather than a bestseller. In a small town like Leeuwarden, every literate or politically-engaged citizen would have known of or come across Ferwerda's Leeuwarder Courant, published since 1752.<sup>2</sup> By 1758, the existence of newspapers was an established feature of political and commercial society; Knoop's preface hinted as much. The bi-weekly Leeuwarder Courant competed with nine other newspapers in the Dutch Republic, all tri- or bi-weekly publications. Close to two hundred newspapers could be found throughout Europe: in bookshops, coffeehouses, bourses, universities, schools, city halls, offices, or on market squares and streets. Dutch newspapers reached Batavia, capital of the Dutch East Indies, and Surinam, folded into correspondence.<sup>3</sup>

To the statesman, merchant or bookseller of the 1750s walking the streets of Amsterdam, London, Hamburg, or even Leeuwarden, the concept of a newspaper brought little novelty. Every generation alive in the middle of the eighteenth century had grown up with newspapers. No one could remember when exactly they had first emerged, and it mattered little to know. The newspaper was one of many features of the diverse news culture of Europe's literate class. News was heard at the city hall and the market square; it was narrated by foreigners and visitors; it was read in a friend's correspondence or shouted out by the town crier; sometimes it was offered to the public through an engraved depiction of a battle or disaster. For all of these reasons, the newspaper was rarely the first source of information; or, at least, of information of immediate importance to the reader. Generally, when it came to urgent matters, the newspaper offered confirmation and supplementary details of news heard elsewhere. It brought together a range of reports from across Europe's theatres of war, its courts, and its ports, creating a continuous digest of international events.

Newspapers were read by "professionals" of the news market, individuals required to follow on a day-to-day basis the comings and goings of European politics: statesmen, merchants, and other news writers. But newspapers were also read by a wide range of citizens from middling backgrounds. They provided a source of entertainment, curiosity, and sociability. The weekly paper could offer a pleasant distraction from the daily grind of labour and commerce. Although newspapers contained little discussion of domestic political affairs, they did present valuable local news in the form of advertisements and public announcements, placed by fellow readers and municipal authorities. Advertising had become so important to newspaper readers that when Ferwerda received his licence to publish his newspaper from the Leeuwarden magistrates, it was only granted on the condition that he would never raise the price of advertising.<sup>4</sup> The newspaper was not only a private, and hopefully profit-making venture, but a public service.

That the newspaper should rise even to these heights was anything but expected. Despite their pervasiveness newspapers were a relatively new invention. The first Dutch newspaper had appeared exactly 140 years before Knoop's handbook was published. It was not accompanied by fanfare of trumpets. It was not immediately embraced and heralded as a fundamental contribution to European society. The reason for this was not difficult to discern. The newspaper was a by-product of a long transformation, set in motion in the later medieval period: the commercialisation of political information.<sup>5</sup> Printed newspapers were initially only a mechanical imitation of commercial handwritten newsletters. These manuscript newsletters had circulated throughout Italy since at least the fifteenth century, and became a staple of Europe's mercantile and political elite. For a substantial fee one could subscribe to a regular newsletter composed by a professional news writer, who would gather together a digest of international reports on the latest political manoeuvres across Europe. Such newsletters would prove immensely popular, and could be found in all corners of Europe by the end of the sixteenth century. The first newspaper publisher, Johann Carolus, was the proprietor of a manuscript newsletter service before he began to print his bulletins on a weekly basis in Strasbourg in 1605.<sup>6</sup> The advent of the newspaper by no means put an end to the production of manuscript newsletters. Rather, the two forms existed in parallel, serving rather different clientele, though elite customers would often avail themselves of both the printed sheets and the more expensive confidential manuscript service. The manuscript news services would flourish particularly in places where the newspaper market was most limited, such as France, where the monopoly of the cautious and sycophantic Paris Gazette ensured that manuscript news services would play an indispensable part in the provision of news right through to the eve of the French Revolution.

From these first beginnings in Strasbourg printed newspapers spread through Europe quite quickly. In the first half of the seventeenth century newspapers emerged in numerous German and Netherlandish towns, but also in London (1621), Paris (1631), and Italy (1639).<sup>7</sup> By the 1660s newspapers could be found in Spain, Portugal, Scotland, Sweden and Poland; by the turn of the century in Ireland,

Russia, Hungary and the Americas.<sup>8</sup> The newspaper had become a cultural phenomenon of the European news world. By the end of the seventeenth century newspaper reading was established as a part of the social and political life of a growing middling class of urban citizenry.<sup>9</sup> Yet the heartland of the newspaper would be Northern Europe: the Holy Roman Empire, the Low Countries, and England. The dissemination of the newspaper was not a uniform development. In different parts of Europe the characteristics, structures, and layout of newspapers differed quite significantly, shaped by local print traditions, perceptions of the scope of the market and the availability of news.<sup>10</sup>

Scholars today have a very clear sense of what constitutes a newspaper. A newspaper is defined by four main features: periodicity (it must appear frequently and on a regular basis); contemporaneity (the news must be new); miscellany (a wide scope of news from different places), and public availability.<sup>11</sup> Such notions were only emerging in the early seventeenth century. Europe's publishers and news writers conceived newspapers in a variety of ways. Newspapers appeared with or without a sequence of numbering; weekly, bi-weekly, tri-weekly or even in rare cases by the end of the century, daily; with or without advertisements or illustrations; in two, four, eight, or sixteen pages. Some newspapers preserved the same title for fifty years, whereas others presented each issue with a different heading. What truly mattered to all newspaper publishers was that their customers could recognise the essential fundamentals of their venture: the steady supply of a variety of foreign political and diplomatic news.

The seventeenth-century Low Countries provided fertile ground for the emergence and development of the newspaper. The region, divided between the Dutch Republic and the Spanish Southern Netherlands, was located at a crucial economic and information gateway between Northern and Southern Europe. Antwerp was the most prominent centre of information exchange in the sixteenth century; by the mid-seventeenth century Amsterdam had taken her place. A high degree of urbanisation and literacy, combined with decentralised political structures and integrated physical infrastructure encouraged the development of a sophisticated printing industry.

The location of the thirteen cities of the Low Countries with at least one Dutch or Flemish newspaper in the seventeenth century. In chronological order of earliest appearance of a newspaper: Amsterdam (1618), Arnhem (1619), Antwerp (1620), Delft (1620), Utrecht (1623), Bruges (1637), The Hague (1652), Haarlem (1656), Weesp (1656), Rotterdam (1666), Ghent (1667), Brussels (1673) and Leiden (1686).

The urban dwellers of Netherlandish towns were leading consumers of books and prints. The four million inhabitants of the Low Countries produced, sold and read the greatest quantity of books per head of population anywhere in Europe.<sup>12</sup> In this vibrant, buoyant and commercially ambitious society, the early newspaper underwent its most transformative and innovative experience of the seventeenth century.

The development of the Netherlandish press was pioneering in many aspects. The Low Countries was the birthplace of a competitive press; of the illustrated news serial; of the first broadsheet newspapers; and of paid newspaper advertising. The first newspapers in the Low Countries were published in Amsterdam by 1618. They were undoubtedly spurred on by the eruption of the Thirty Years' War

(1618–1648) and the emergence of the Dutch Republic as the bulwark of embattled Protestant Europe. For the first time in any European city, two competing weekly newspapers provided readers with a steady stream of reports concerning the conflict in Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Hungary and the Palatinate. Already in 1620 a Dutch pamphlet discussing the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, Boheemsch Geluyt (Bohemian racket), pointed towards newspapers as a regular source of public information.<sup>13</sup> In the pamphlet Timotheus and Theophilus are discussing the war; Timotheus admits that he sometimes reads the newspapers, as his neighbour gets them regularly; for his part Theophilus professes to read both Amsterdam newspapers each week. Around the same time the Antwerp engraver and printer Abraham Verhoeven initiated a regular news serial in the Habsburg Netherlands. Verhoeven provided an alternative voice to the two Amsterdam newspapermen, out-producing both throughout the 1620s. Verhoeven offered to his readers news from much the same regions, battles and manoeuvres as his northern rivals, but did so with a unique blend of wit, flair and innovation.

Verhoeven was replaced at the end of his career by new publishers in Antwerp and Bruges, attracted to the prospect of making a career in the business of periodical news. In the Dutch Republic the two newspapermen were joined by many others. By the mid-1640s, Amsterdam was the newspaper capital of Europe, with six newspaper publishers producing a total of ten weekly issues on four days of the week.<sup>14</sup> In the seventeenth century this intensity of production would only be matched in London in the 1640s, at the height of the political conflict of the English Civil Wars. While books in Dutch had little international appeal, this did not hinder the international distribution of Dutch and Flemish newspapers. They were read at the courts of England, France and Sweden, and in the princely states of the Holy Roman Empire. The papers would be translated, copied by hand or reprinted in Cologne, London and Moscow.<sup>15</sup> Their style and standards greatly influenced the British press: when the state-sponsored London Gazette was founded by the English government in 1665, it adopted the unique broadsheet design of Dutch newspapers, as opposed to the more conventional folded pamphlet style of other European titles.

Over the course of the seventeenth century at least 43 Dutch and Flemish newspapers would be published in nine cities in the Dutch Republic and four cities in the Southern Netherlands (see fig. 1.1). To this number we must also add a variety of printed news serials: publications without strict periodicity or limited in terms of the geographical scope of their news content, but operating in a similar competitive market for current affairs. These news serials are therefore also included in the corpus of periodicals discussed in this part, and included in the accompanying bibliography.<sup>16</sup> As D.H. Couvée stated in 1962, “any student of journalism ... makes a dangerous error” by leaving out news serials of this sort on the grounds that they do not meet the strict definitions laid down by modern newspaper scholars.<sup>17</sup>

Newspapers are ephemeral publications. The vast majority of seventeenth-century newspapers were bought, read, perhaps shared with friends, and then thrown away. Around two-thirds of all the newspaper issues documented in this bibliography survive in only a single copy. These are often tucked away between ambassadorial letters, or lurking in governmental archives where secretaries pored over the copy to discern any hint of defamation of their head of state. Some newspapers are known to us in only a single or handful of surviving issues; it is very possible that there are other newspapers published in the Dutch Republic or Southern Netherlands which have now disappeared completely. Two previously unnoticed newspapers in fact re-appeared in the course of the archival searches undertaken for this bibliography: one in a short run of issues bound into a pamphlet collection in Trinity College, Dublin; the other in a single issue unearthed in the Athenaeumbibliotheek, Deventer.<sup>18</sup>

The passage of time has done much to obscure the actual production of seventeenth-century newspapers. They have been lost because their first owners did not think them worth keeping. Although newspaper publishers throughout Europe did their best to induce their customers to use their newspapers as reference works and contemporary histories, few such collections survive today. A few contemporary collectors, historians, and bibliophiles collected newspapers, but they were the exception rather than the norm. While many statesmen, scholars and ministers collected immense quantities of short political pamphlets and polemical tracts, preserving them in bound volumes, newspapers did not often enjoy the same privilege. Newspapers rarely feature in the sale of seventeenth-century libraries or collections. Newspaper seem to have become rarities relatively soon after their initial appearance. This was, and still is today, the cruelty of the news cycle.

A Bibliographical Quest

The study of the early Dutch and Flemish press dates back to the middle of the nineteenth century. In the Netherlands, W.P. Sautijn Kluit wrote several book-length articles on the history of Dutch newspapers from their inception to his contemporary age in the 1860s, 1870s and 1880s.<sup>19</sup> Sautijn Kluit adopted a micro-historical approach: in each article he offered a chronological history of the press in one Dutch city, detailing changes in typography, proprietors and other characteristics particular to the place or time. Sautijn Kluit had access to only a few surviving issues of most seventeenth-century newspapers, often residing in private collections. He therefore relied largely on archival sources: privileges granted and sentences handed out to newspaper publishers who transgressed the largely unwritten rules that governed editorial choices. A few newspapers, such as the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant and the Amsterdamsche Courant, survive in near-complete runs towards the end of the seventeenth century, but these are not the norm. Some of Sautijn Kluit's bibliographic conjectures are no longer valid, but many of his articles have not yet been replaced by modern studies—for example, nothing has been published on the early Dutch press in Rotterdam since Sautijn Kluit wrote on the subject in 1878.<sup>20</sup>

In Belgium, scholars like André Warzée, Alfons Goovaerts and Lodewijk Torfs made similar advances to Sautijn Kluit. They documented for the first time the earliest publication of printed newspapers, detailing, where archival sources permitted them, the lives and careers of their publishers.<sup>21</sup> But many early scholars of the press were more content to frame the early history of newspapers in patriotic terms.<sup>22</sup> Around the turn of the twentieth century it was deemed most important to find evidence of the earliest newspaper in order to claim primacy in this innovative media form for one's own local domain. After all, the late nineteenth century was a period when the newspaper was the dominant source of commercial news; the early existence of a newspaper was a thus clear sign of civilisation and cultural sophistication. In 1859 Eugène

Hatin, one of the first historians of the press, trumpeted the Paris Gazette of 1631 as the first newspaper published in Europe.<sup>23</sup> This set off a determined search for predecessors from other nations. Alfons Goovaerts made the case for the Antwerp publisher Abraham Verhoeven with a withering dismissal of the Frenchman's claims:

The first months of 1631! Truly, that claim will have to be rejected completely! Certainly not! That honour does not belong to France, and, without having to go back to praise the Babylonians or Greeks ... it can be assured, that long before 1631 ... there was a newspaper, truly worthy of that definition, published in Antwerp by our Abraham Verhoeven.<sup>24</sup>

Scholars chased archival references to claim that lost newspapers unknown to bibliographers had been published in their country before any others.<sup>25</sup> Not all scholars participated in this flag-waving, and some newspaper myths were debunked shortly after their inception.<sup>26</sup> But myths are tenacious, and up to at least the 1930s there was little consensus on a European-wide narrative of the emergence of the newspaper.

The nationalistic sentiments of press history did not suit the atmosphere of post-War Europe. With regards to the Low Countries, the Swedish bibliographer Folke Dahl was responsible for putting to rest some of the more far-fetched interpretations of his predecessors. After Dahl discovered a cache of over 1,100 seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish newspapers in the Kungliga Biblioteket in Stockholm, he devoted himself to the documentation of the first decades of Netherlandish newspaper printing.<sup>27</sup> In Stockholm Dahl found the earliest known Dutch newspaper, dating from June 1618. The collection also included the serial Nouvelles Neutrelles (1621), De Gulden Passer 95, No. 1 (forthcoming, 2017).

Frans Jozef Van Den Branden, archivist in Antwerp, also demonstrated convincingly in 1902 that Abraham Verhoeven was not publishing a news serial in 1605, but only from 1620 onwards. See his Ontstaan van het nieuwsblad te Antwerpen: Abraham Verhoeven zijn leven, 1575–1652 (Antwerpen, J.E. Buschmann, 1902).

hundreds of unknown issues of newspapers from Amsterdam, Delft, Arnhem and Antwerp. These discoveries, together with issues held in Paris, The Hague and other cities, were brought together in Dutch Corantos, Dahl's bibliography of Dutch newspapers up to 1650.<sup>28</sup> To date, this is the only bibliography available to scholars. Dahl did not include the Antwerp newspapers in Dutch Corantos, but offered a separate article on the discoveries relevant for the Belgian press.<sup>29</sup>

While Dahl's work was invaluable to knowledge of the early periodical press in the Low Countries, he hesitated to assert a significant role for the newspapers in the wider process of historical change. Dahl believed that

It cannot be expected of him [the bibliographer] to state the relative importance of newspapers in this [Dutch] culture, because such a close knowledge of politics, science, literature, art, etc. is needed that one man could hardly weigh their comparative merits ... it would be in the interest of scientific economy to limit his field of research accordingly.<sup>30</sup>

While Dahl also completed valuable work on early English news serials, he did not go much beyond his initial inquiries documenting surviving issues.<sup>31</sup> His discoveries regarding the Antwerp newspapers were taken up enthusiastically by Belgian scholars, most prominently Theo Luykx. In the 1960s and 1970s the history of the Flemish press was expanded and updated through the documentation of other surviving issues and a wealth of archival references to newspaper publishers and their privileges.<sup>32</sup> The first Southern Netherlandish newspaper publisher, Abraham Verhoeven, continued to attract significant interest. The extraordinary survival of the majority of his newspaper issues in Belgian libraries, his raucous but well-documented life, and his pioneering adventures in the news trade fascinated successive generations of scholars. While Verhoeven's news serial, the Nieuwe Tijdinghen, started only in 1620, he was already active as a news publisher by 1605. The early experimental stage of Verhoeven's career continued to be heralded as sure evidence of the existence of a newspaper in Antwerp in 1605. In 2005 Verhoeven was celebrated in a variety of events and publications as Europe's "first gazetteer", including the exhibition "400 years of newspapers: Abraham Verhoeven 1605–2005" sponsored by the International Centre for the Press in Flanders.<sup>33</sup>

Dutch scholars, content with Sautijn Kluit's microhistories and Dahl's early bibliography, did not pursue significant further bibliographic work throughout the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s. A general history of Dutch newspapers was published by Maarten Schneider in 1943 and updated (with Joan Hemels) successively up to 1979, but the reissues did not contribute new material to the seventeenth- and eighteenth-century sections of the work.<sup>34</sup> In 1971 the English historian G.C. Gibbs lamented that even though the Dutch had played an influential role in the development of the periodical press no study could effectively document this contribution given the poor state of knowledge on the subject:

To speak with any degree of real authority about the origins and early development of newspapers in the Dutch Republic during the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries is at the moment impossible. Such is the present state of ignorance that in many cases, and for long stretches of time, it is difficult to establish much more, or anything more, than that a newspaper existed or probably existed. ... What is certain, however, is that until the elementary basis for the effective study of such newspapers has been provided—namely, a published catalogue of the holdings of early newspapers—we are not even in a position to know what can be known and what can never be known. The compilation of such a catalogue would without doubt be a mammoth task, which would of necessity take the whole of Europe for its oyster. The task of compiling such a catalogue, though immense, however, would be rewarding, and is certainly long overdue. The hope ... of stimulating some Dutch scholar to [compose a bibliography] has fallen very largely on deaf ears.<sup>35</sup>

Gibbs' call was heeded in the 1980s and 1990s by a new generation of scholars. Otto Lankhorst, René Vos, and Ingrid Maier documented a variety of newly discovered holdings of Dutch and Flemish newspapers in London, Germany, Poland and Russia.<sup>36</sup> They extended some of Dahl's findings beyond 1650, and improved on his survey of the newspapers published before 1650. The present bibliography has been built on the foundations of the latest scholarly efforts made by Lankhorst, Vos and Maier. Its completion has also been facilitated by recent advances in digital technology, which has allowed the search for stray issues in a wide variety of dispersed collections: the bibliography presented here identifies eighty-four collections in thirteen different countries which hold at least one issue of one of the listed publications. I have also been greatly assisted by the readiness of libraries and archives to make images and digital scans of their holdings freely available. This, in particular, has allowed the identification of several hundred variant issues. In those comparatively rare cases where more than one copy of an issue survives, there are often significant typographical differences between the two, making clear that many of the more popular papers could only fulfil demand by operating two presses simultaneously. For this work the recent development of the Dutch digital newspaper platform, Delfpher, has been particularly helpful.<sup>37</sup> Bringing together and enhancing the results of successive generations' bibliographic research, together with the application of these more modern research tools, has allowed the creation of the most complete picture yet of the first century of newspaper publication in the Low Countries.

New Departures

The history of the newspaper came to the forefront of political and social history in the later 1980s and 1990s.<sup>38</sup> The bibliographic achievements of scholars like Dahl were, for the first time, framed within the history not only of the press, but of early modern society and politics. This development was most prominent at the end of the Cold War, when increasing scholarly attention was devoted to analysis of Western traditions of democracy, civil society and liberal communication, values regarded as pillars of Western political and social power. Ironically it was a Marxist history of information and communication, Jürgen Habermas' The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere, which became the staple of media and communication disciplines for much of the 1990s and early 2000s.

Habermas' work, which appeared for the first time in English in 1989, transformed discussions of the role of the press in early modern politics and social life.<sup>39</sup> Habermas traced the emergence of popular and public political debate in European society around the early eighteenth century. He focused on the growing prominence of a civil society independent of the state, operating in a "public sphere". The public sphere characterised by Habermas was the result of increasing opposition to the traditional realm of politics, in which discussion of affairs of state had been limited to an exclusive arena of statesmen and courtiers. The Habermasian public sphere was centred on three fundamental characteristics: inclusivity, liberty and reason.<sup>40</sup> The public sphere was created by active citizens, who, coming together in public spaces, debated and exchanged opinions on current political affairs, refuting one another through rational arguments.<sup>41</sup> The public sphere was based on the open exchange and evaluation of information. In this the role of newspaper was crucial: it served as a platform through which citizens could regularly receive political information and assess its trustworthiness in comparison to other media. In the public sphere, the newspaper aided the rise of an informed, critical citizenry: it was a democratising force.<sup>42</sup>

To Habermas, the utopian early eighteenth-century public sphere was rapidly overcome by the manipulative powers of the state and business, which by the nineteenth century had largely devalued and spoiled the fundamental structures of the public sphere. The teleological nature of the public sphere identified by Habermas was largely rejected by early modern scholars.<sup>43</sup> But the rejection of Habermas' account prompted scholars to delve deeper into the history of media and the newspaper; not only relying on surviving issues but often turning to archival records, to early modern readers of newspapers, and to the intricacies of newspaper publishing in a milieu where customers largely preferred other sources of news.

The emergence of newspapers is no longer observed as a single defining moment of news culture or a sign of cultural progression, but as an accompaniment of wider economic and social transformations in the early European information world.<sup>44</sup> The importance of scribal newsletters and postal networks has been emphasised as a crucial foundations of the newspaper trade.<sup>45</sup> Histories by Jeremy Popkin and Joad Raymond of the French and English press respectively highlight the human qualities and personal reactions of newspaper writers and readers.<sup>46</sup> Instead of treating the press as a natural opponent of the state and its repressive institutions, pressures from within the news trade and the ability of publishers to shape this new environment have come to the forefront of press history.<sup>47</sup> The financial and material conditions of periodicals and their readers are becoming ever more important, as are considerations of the distribution of news; the business relations of booksellers and editors; and the role of the newspaper in a wider sphere of print and information.

In the Low Countries numerous scholars have recently made significant contributions to a reconsideration of the seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish press. Work by Joop Koopmans, Paul Arblaster, Steven van Impe, Michiel van Groesen, Ingrid Maier, Marika Keblusek, Henk Borst, Jeroen Blaak, Judith Brouwer, Helmer Helmers and Marcel Broersma has created a more sophisticated understanding of the inner workings of the Netherlandish press.<sup>48</sup> We are now in a position to know much more about the readers of seventeenth-century Dutch newspapers; the complicated and often confused reactions of authorities in the Low Countries to the emergence of a serial press; the position of newspaper publishers within their literary and commercial milieu; the interaction between newspapers and other forms of printed and handwritten news; the international appeal and reach of Netherlandish newspapers; and the crucial role played by the European postal network in the furnishing of newspaper content. Intensive research into early newspapers across Europe has also provided a framework in which different vernacular cultures of newspaper publishing can be compared with one another, creating what Raymond has termed "an international history of the press".<sup>49</sup>

This present study seeks to build on the foundations established by this literature, informed by the bibliographical survey undertaken as part of this project, and laid out in the accompanying bibliography. In the seventeenth century the Dutch and Flemish press adapted and evolved in reaction to changing relationships between newspaper publishers, authorities and the wider news market. Newspaper publishers were influenced by pressures and changing fashions at home and abroad, but they were also able to claim new roles for their publications, predominantly through advertising and the diversification of their news networks. The development of the press is wrought with paradoxes. The Netherlandish press is innovative in form and design yet in some respects newspapers regressed during the course of the century, as the early expansion was halted by authorities determined to bring the newspaper under their control. For all the innovation, competition and popularity of the early Netherlandish press, it was not to lead European news culture into the eighteenth century. By the end of the seventeenth century it enjoyed less political freedom, engaged fewer publishers and played a smaller role in the European sphere of information.

By the eighteenth century the Dutch press would come to play a different role to that in England or France. But it was not, as Schneider's general history of the Dutch press claims, qualitatively boring and uninspiring; other historians have echoed similar sentiments of a "sober, colourless press."<sup>50</sup> Schneider took the ultimate test of the quality of the Dutch press to be its "free development" and the capacity to challenge authority.<sup>51</sup> This is a sentiment which derives primarily from a teleological conception of the history of the press.<sup>52</sup> Since the French Revolution, newspapers throughout the world have always presented themselves as gate-keepers of the truth: they hold governments to account and unravel the obscurities thrown up by malicious forces. Newspapers discuss primarily domestic political events, judging political leaders and policies on a daily basis. Seventeenth-century newspapers certainly did not do so—but that does not render them apolitical or "boring". The seventeenth-century press played a different role in society than that of the nineteenth-century or modern press, but it should be judged on its own terms, rather than that of its descendants.

North and South

The remainder of this first essay is composed of two overarching sections. Chapters two, three and four detail the structural and qualitative development of the Dutch and Flemish press in a largely chronological narrative. Chapter two charts the rise and decline of Amsterdam as a newspaper centre in the Dutch national market; chapter three details the development of the Dutch press in The Hague, Haarlem, and elsewhere throughout the second half of the seventeenth century; and chapter four turns to the Southern Netherlands, to offer a history of the press in Antwerp, Bruges, Brussels, and Ghent in three chronological stages. Chapter five investigates the daily life of the newspaperman, using here the quintessentially Dutch term "courantier", a usage that captures the diverse responsibilities that characterised the making of a newspaper: the creation of an international news network, testing editorial strategies, building relationships with booksellers and customers, and somehow turning a profit. Chapter six reflects at greater length on the relationship between the newspaper, its readers and the state.

Most studies of the early press have approached newspapers from national perspectives. I have with this work deliberately obscured the tenuous borders between the Dutch Republic and the Southern Netherlands to bring together Dutch and Flemish newspapers for consideration in a single linguistic area. This is partly motivated by an ambition to tease out the similarities, differences, and influences between the two regions; Dutch and Flemish newspaper publishers watched one another closely, and newspapers easily crossed the border between north and south. But my approach is also inspired by the concurrent lack of comprehensive bibliographies for both Dutch and Flemish newspapers.

On the other hand, this work does not consider in-depth newspapers published in the seventeenth-century Low Countries in languages other than Dutch and Flemish. Close to thirty French newspapers would be published in the Low Countries in the seventeenth century; English, Spanish, Italian and Yiddish newspapers also appeared in Amsterdam and Brussels.<sup>53</sup> While I do discuss the publication and appearance of such newspapers in the following chapters and some of the individual newspaper introductions, non-Dutch language newspapers are not included in the bibliography.

Foreign-language newspapers in the Low Countries, especially French newspapers, have received a great deal of attention from other scholars. A comprehensive répertoire of all French-language periodicals, together with several in-depth studies, have been published over the last two decades after intensive research by a variety of French and Dutch scholars in the 1980s and 1990s.<sup>54</sup> Early English newspapers printed in Amsterdam are discussed extensively by Dahl and Boys.<sup>55</sup> Italian newspapers published in Amsterdam are covered by Nina Lamal in her forthcoming bibliography of Italian newspapers, while the short-lived Yiddish Amsterdam newspaper has recently been studied by Hilde Pach-Oosterbroek in her doctoral dissertation.<sup>56</sup> It is also the case that foreign-language newspapers performed a different role within the Netherlandish book market and news trade. The earliest seventeenth-century French and English newspapers published in the Low Countries were translations of Dutch newspapers, rather than independent titles. All English newspapers were destined for export to England; in 1633 Jan van Hilten even used the English pamphlet format for his English translation in order to appeal to English audiences.<sup>57</sup> The English publisher Samuel Browne, working in The Hague, specified in his French Le Mercure Anglois that he destined it for export, presumably to France and England.<sup>58</sup> At the same time Browne published a Dutch serial aimed at local consumers.<sup>59</sup> It is also significant in this respect that the numerous advertisements placed by Dutch booksellers in the Tijdinghen uyt verscheide Quartieren of Broer Jansz did not feature in its corresponding French translation, the Nouvelles de divers

Quartiers.<sup>60</sup> Presumably this too was largely intended for export to other markets.

Not all ventures in the second half of the seventeenth century were translations of existing Dutch titles. Some, like the Nouvelles extraordinaires de divers endroits (commonly known as the Gazette de Leyde), were independent ventures. The majority of French newspapers in the Dutch Republic were started by Huguenot refugees who had arrived after the revocation of the edict of Nantes (1685). The principal customers of these newspapers were located beyond the Dutch Republic; especially in France, where the monopoly of the state-sponsored Paris Gazette inhibited the publication of other periodicals. Around half of all advertisements placed in the Gazette de Leyde were placed by French subscribers for Parisian goods and products.<sup>61</sup> In the Southern Netherlands the exclusion of French newspapers rests on a more unstable footing. Arguably the most prominent newspaper of the Southern Netherlands from 1649 onwards was the Brussels Relations véritables, a French bi-weekly newspaper. Nevertheless, this newspaper was targeted primarily at Francophone elites, in Brussels as well as in France and the Holy Roman Empire. The Relations véritables cost three times as much as its Flemish rivals in Antwerp, Ghent and Bruges.

Of course, the division of markets for Dutch, French, English and other newspapers were by no means as strict as implied above. Some statesmen and merchants clearly read newspapers in different languages. Yet ultimately newspapers were a vernacular phenomenon: a characteristic which I have maintained by restricting the parameters of the project at hand to the Dutch market. This, as we will see, was robust enough to justify the full analytical study offered in these two volumes.

Amsterdam: Innovation and Transformation

In 1619 the Dutch Republic reached the climax of its first existential crisis: its victim was the young state's internationally respected leader, Johan van Oldenbarnevelt. The seventy-one year old Oldenbarnevelt was the new state's most experienced statesmen; he had served in high office through every formative stage of the republic. All of that time he had worked closely with Prince William of Orange and his son, Maurice. But Oldenbarnevelt and Maurice now found themselves on opposite sides of the religious and political crisis dividing the towns, the provinces and each urban community of the republic. Backed by a groundswell of popular anger, Maurice seized his chance. On 12 May 1619 Oldenbarnevelt was convicted of treason by a jury of his enemies and condemned to death. The sentence was carried out the very next day, on 13 May—barely time to gather the necessary crowd to witness the old man's execution in The Hague.

Among those present was the Amsterdam publisher Broer Jansz (1579–1652). Broer Jansz was an experienced newsman. As a young man he had followed the army of Stadhouder Maurice, reporting on the progress of the summer campaign against the Spanish from the Dutch headquarters. In later years he would continue to style himself “former courantier in the army of His Princely Excellency”. He was, in effect, one of the first embedded war correspondents. Jansz had a nose for a news story. He knew that the execution of Oldenbarnevelt was the most critical news event in the history of the new republic, so he hurried down from Amsterdam to take his place in the hushed crowd witnessing Oldenbarnevelt make his dignified end. As soon as he returned to Amsterdam Jansz rushed out an account of the execution, printed on one side of a single sheet.<sup>1</sup> Demand was so high that he had to print at least two editions. The text ended with the tantalising inducement that “what follows next I will communicate to you this coming Friday in my newspaper.”

This small vignette offer several pointers to the momentous changes underway in the contemporary news market. Oldenbarnevelt's execution took place at a moment when the newspapers were a very new element in the news environment. Broer Jansz, by making the journey to The Hague, was recognising several features of the demand for news which would shape the future, and the values, of the new medium. First was the importance of contemporaneity, the need to be first with the news. Broer Jansz's presence in the crowd was also a recognition of the importance of an eye-witness account and for authoritative sources in validating reports. Finally, all newspapermen would be mindful of the iron rule, that news should be verifiably true. No report should be included if there was no credible evidence to support it; if it was an unconfirmed rumour, this should be stated. All these considerations would be essential considerations in defining the new medium, and played a critical role in shaping the future of the newspaper trade in the Dutch Republic.

Broer Jansz was in fact one of two newsmen in Amsterdam who had recently started to publish a weekly newspaper. This was quite exceptional, even in the fast developing European news world. It was not yet twenty years since the first attempts had been made in Germany to sell printed serial news: the first printed weekly news service was established in Strasbourg in 1605. During the next few decades newspapers would emerge across Europe in dozens of cities. Most of them, like the newspapers of Jansz and his competitor, Caspar van Hilten (?–c. 1623), came out once a week. Many early newspapers struggled. It was hard to gather enough subscribers to cover the costs of news gathering, production and distribution; and to convince customers that what they lacked in life was a regular news digest of foreign, diplomatic and military news.

Very quickly newspaper publishers realised that in order to succeed they had to minimise competition. News-men appealed to local authorities for exclusive privileges to print newspapers: to protect their investment and to uphold standards. This appealed to many statesmen, and in most parts of Europe newspapers enjoyed a local monopoly. But this was not the case in Amsterdam. By 1619 both Broer Jansz and his colleague Caspar van Hilten had established newspapers that would last for more than half a century.<sup>2</sup> And these pioneering ventures were soon followed by others: within another twenty-five years Amsterdam was home to six competing newspapermen. The avid news reader could buy fresh news on five days of the week. Amsterdam was the most competitive news market in Europe. For the first half of the seventeenth century the Amsterdam newsmen supplied not only local customers, but news readers throughout the Dutch Republic. In effect, they cultivated the first national market for periodical news. The Amsterdam pioneers ensured that the newspaper would be an abiding presence in the social and political consciousness of the young state.

A New Information Capital

The emergence of the newspaper required the regulation and commercialisation of a variety of information channels. This was a process which took place throughout the Dutch Republic around the turn of the seventeenth century, when the state was in its infancy.<sup>3</sup> The expansion and improvement of a postal system was critical. From the mid-sixteenth onwards Dutch towns began to appoint stadsbodes—city messengers, departing for other destinations with regular schedules.<sup>4</sup> A sophisticated system of interregional networks dominated by natural and man-made waterways provided the arteries of the Dutch news network.<sup>5</sup> This was a society which ran on information. Policy-making required constant communication between dispersed urban communities. With few natural resources, the Dutch economy was built on the exploitation of foreign markets and a smooth system of transportation and distribution. The financial, and thereby political, success of the Dutch Republic rested on the assessment and mitigation of risk. Information on the state of Europe's potentates, ports, currencies and prices was the lifeblood of the Dutch state.

The city of Amsterdam would always remain at the centre of the Dutch information network. A small medieval town built on the marshes of Northern Holland, Amsterdam had developed in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries into a major entrepôt of the European bulk-carrying trade.<sup>6</sup> When thousands of Protestant refugees from the Southern Netherlands migrated to Amsterdam in the late sixteenth century, they brought with them considerable expertise in banking, trade, and—crucial for the emergence of the newspaper—printing. The extraordinary influx of manpower and capital lifted many Dutch cities into prosperity, but the dizzying effects were most pronounced in Amsterdam. The rise of Amsterdam prompted the establishment of new channels of trade and information. By the early 1600s, there were four post offices in Amsterdam: for letters to Antwerp, Hamburg, Cologne and the domestic post, with the latter serving around twenty different Dutch towns. In 1586 a currency exchange was established in Amsterdam. This was followed by a stock exchange (the bourse) in 1602, and the Bank of Amsterdam in 1609.<sup>7</sup> These institutions, clustered around the central Dam square, served as principal locations for the exchange of news and information. Hundreds of merchants gathered at the bourse, sharing the latest reports (see ill. 2.1). Trading on the bourse was open only for one hour a day, before noon. This strict schedule ensured that merchants, messengers, brokers and news writers flocked around the bourse for hours before and after the trading hour in order to share news, rumour and speculations on future price movements.

The first two generations of Amsterdam newspaper publishers would all establish themselves close to this beating heart of the city's information network. The shops of the Van Hiltens, François Lieshout and Mathijs van Meininga were located at or around the corner from the bourse; Joost Broersz was in the adjacent Pijlsteeg stretching east from the Dam square; Jan Jacobsz Bouman on “the water”, (now the Damrak) the canal stretching north from the Dam square where one could find many other bookshops; and Broer Jansz would move in 1621 to the Nieuwezijds Achterburgwal (now the Spuistraat), two minutes' walk from the bourse.

Even before these newsmen and their printed newspapers appeared in Amsterdam there was already a considerable market for regular news services. The development of the postal network and the physical infrastructure of Amsterdam's information exchange sustained the emergence of a vast market in handwritten newsletters. In Gerbrand Bredero's 1617 play De Spaanscher Brabander the character Harmen demands the latest news from his acquaintance Andries, noting that “before sunrise you’re already on the bridge [the New Bridge, another notable location of information exchange] / where you pick up the news before it’s flown.”<sup>8</sup> In ruthlessly commercial Amsterdam, information was most valuable when it had not yet “flown”, or become common knowledge.

Enterprising businessmen took advantage of the demand for exclusive information. By soliciting correspondence from Europe’s great postal centres, they could sell this news as a short, regular digest of handwritten reports. Such newsletters had been popular in Italy since the fifteenth century, but by the beginning of the seventeenth century they were common in the Dutch Republic, especially in Amsterdam.<sup>9</sup> The most regular customers of these services were the magistrates of Dutch towns. In the early

1600s the Amsterdam newsletter writer Cornelis Cools supplied news to the town councils of The Hague, Dordrecht, Middelburg, Utrecht, Arnhem and Groningen.<sup>10</sup> In 1602, Adriaen Vasseur was paid 12 stuivers a day by the council of Amsterdam to supply news from the military front.<sup>11</sup>

The manuscript services were extremely popular. The United East India Company (VOC) chamber of Amsterdam paid 25 gulden a year for handwritten newsletters in 1606, but cancelled the subscription in 1616 on the grounds that most members received their own newsletters, preferring them to the communal letters.<sup>12</sup> The playwright and avid news reader P.C. Hooft quipped in his Warenar (1617) that the citizens of Amsterdam read “twice a week, front to back, the current news [courante nouvelles] from the four corners of the town.”<sup>13</sup> While Hooft’s line is not conclusive evidence of the existence of printed newspapers in Amsterdam by 1617, it certainly demonstrate the integration of the language of commercial news into popular literature.

The first printed newspapers emerged out of this established market for manuscript newsletters. The incentive to turn to print was commercial: a printed newsletter could be produced in hundreds of copies in a day's work. The mechanical production of news drove down the retail price. Around 1600 the philosopher Justus Lipsius paid 14 gulden a year for a weekly manuscript newsletter service in Antwerp, and the town council of Leiden paid 36 gulden.<sup>14</sup> An annual subscription to a weekly Amsterdam paper cost only 3 gulden—around 1 stuiver per weekly issue.<sup>15</sup> But the emergence of printed newspapers cannot be explained by the ease of production or lower price alone. It was no coincidence that the first newspapers appeared in the 1610s. In the Dutch Republic this was a time of great uncertainty, culminating in the political crisis which precipitated the execution of Oldenbarnevelt. For years the country was gripped by a confessional debate between the followers of Jacobus Arminius and Conradus Vorstius, professors of theology at Leiden, and the more rigid Calvinist supporters of Franciscus Gomarus, also professor at Leiden. The debate rapidly became political when many Holland regents, including Oldenbarnevelt, supported the Arminians, or Remonstrants, while the Stadhouder, Maurice, threw his weight behind the Contra-Remonstrants.

The crisis was heightened by the looming end of the Twelve Years' Truce with Spain, due to expire in 1621. Oldenbarnevelt and many magistrates preferred negotiations to prolong the peace, a position which was denounced in Contra-Remonstrant pamphlets as a plot to surrender hard-won Dutch independence by implicitly acknowledging Spanish sovereignty. Conspiracy theories of international Catholic plots became ever more realistic with the eruption of the Thirty Years' War in Bohemia in 1618, and increasing tensions between Calvinists and Catholics in France and Switzerland. In the middle of the 1610s the Dutch Republic turned into the European centre of Calvinist publicity, news and lobbying; proponents of the renewal of the war exerted public pressure on their regents by publicising the plight of Calvinists throughout Europe and emphasising the dangers of a fifth column at home. Both Broer Jansz and Caspar van Hilten described themselves as former news writers associated with the Prince Maurice, the republic's most active proponent of an aggressive foreign policy. Their newspapers offered welcome publicity to the tribulations of international Calvinism and certainly played a role in the encouragement of war sentiment in the Dutch Republic.

The first extant Dutch newspaper is Van Hilten's Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c., dated from June 1618 (see ill. 2.2). The Courante, appearing on a weekly basis, was printed by Joris Veseler, an emigré from Antwerp. Around the same time Broer Jansz had launched a similar weekly newspaper. This was untitled until 1629, when it became the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren. The first extant issue of Jansz's newspaper dates from February 1619, but it is very well possible that he may have started his venture before Van Hilten. Until 1624 both newspapers did not appear on the same day each week, but from that date both settled on Saturday as the day of publication.

The Courante and the Tijdinghen were breaking new ground in their adoption of a broadsheet format. Hitherto, all news serials in the Holy Roman Empire, and later those in France, Italy and other countries, were published as folded pamphlets of four, eight, or sixteen pages.<sup>16</sup> In contrast, the Amsterdam papers appeared as double-sided single sheets. While the early reports in Amsterdam newspapers did not differ greatly in content from German, French or English news, the new format was a crucial innovation: it maximised the quantity of news in relation to the paper used, and thus also greatly reduced unit cost.

The broadsheet papers were relatively plain, featuring only a sober title as heading. This was followed by two columns of news on both sides of the sheet. The margins were narrow; there was little wasted space. Van Hilten and Jansz did their best to fill their papers to the brim. In contrast, many pamphlet newspapers featured elaborate title-pages, and usually contained one or two blank pages (often the last verso, sometimes the back of the title-page). By the mid-1620s the Amsterdam newspapers contained around 1,750–2,000 words of news per issue—in contrast, Abraham Verhoeven in Antwerp would fill the issues of his pamphlet-style Nieuwe Tijdinghen (using the same amount of paper) with only 1,000 words per issue. Driving down the cost of paper, the Amsterdam newspapermen could invest more in their news sources and correspondents. The two Amsterdam newsmen set the standard for all Dutch newspapers well into the eighteenth century. While some periodicals later in the seventeenth century would experiment with a pamphlet format, Dutch publishers and readers would most associate “newspapers” with this Amsterdam presentation. From the 1630s Southern Netherlandish newspapers would imitate the Dutch design, as would English newspapers from the 1660s onwards.

Caspar van Hilten died in 1622 or 1623 and was succeeded as publisher by his son Jan van Hilten (c. 1602–1655). Broer Jansz and the younger Van Hilten had relatively little in common. Jan van Hilten was more than twenty years Jansz's junior. As a young man Jansz had experienced the emergence of the Dutch state in the 1590s and early 1600s, while Van Hilten was born into a world where the existence of the Dutch Republic was an undeniable reality. Jansz had started his career as an apprentice in the book trade, and worked his way up to become a compositor. He was already writing and publishing news when Van Hilten was a toddler.<sup>17</sup> While Jansz was a true newsman, his newspaper was only one part of his vast business interests. In 1614 he was appointed stadsdrukker (city-printer) by the magistrates of Amsterdam, responsible for the printing of municipal ordinances and forms.<sup>18</sup> In the 1630s he became the printer of the Athenaeum Illustré, the illustrious school of Amsterdam. Jansz spent much of his time printing works for other publishers, and printing almanacs, plays, devotional tracts, and other jobbing work, such as wedding poems.

In contrast, Jan van Hilten had the time to devote himself completely to news writing and publishing. For the first decade of his career as courantier, he published only his newspaper and a range of news pamphlets and illustrated broadsheets. Even the printing of his newspaper he delegated to colleagues in the book trade. Only from 1646 did Van Hilten own a printing press. While Broer Jansz ran a busy shop, Van Hilten could invest all his efforts in improving the quality of his newspaper.

Broer Jansz is often considered to be more Calvinist and Orangist in his sympathies than Jan van Hilten—both by scholars and contemporary observers.<sup>19</sup> An anonymous pamphlet published in Antwerp in 1638 ridiculed Broer Jansz as a failed propagandist after the Dutch defeat at the battle of Kallo.<sup>20</sup> In this pamphlet the writer has Jansz lamenting the lack of good news from the front, before “Jansz” suggests the obvious remedy:

I'll write something about the Swedish army /
Or dig up some old news /
Or I'll lie about events in Brasil /
For that's far away enough from here.<sup>21</sup>

There was, of course, no more damaging accusation than that a newsman would invent his news. But this sort of attack was not uncommon: Jansz, so the narrative goes, was an older, sloppier, and more partisan voice than Van Hilten. Yet Van Hilten too was attacked from the Southern Netherlands for his frequent “lies” concerning Catholic defeats, and he too covered the successes of the Dutch army and navy with evident relish.<sup>22</sup> P.C. Hooft, an avid reader of newspapers, commented to his brother-in-law Joost Baak on 25 August 1631 that “Yesterday my brother-in-law Bartelot sent me the tidings of Veseler [the printer of Van Hilten's paper], which are more agreeable than those of Broer [Jansz], which came from you.”<sup>23</sup> But Hooft continued, stating that he would “always find in this one something which is not in the other”.

Clearly Hooft considered it useful to read both newspapers for their different perspectives. He was not the only one: issues of the two newspapers often survive mixed together in the same volumes. Statesmen and wealthy news readers like Hooft knew that each newspaper provided different sources and perspectives. Some of the first issues published by Broer Jansz and the Van Hiltens already display remarkable differences. In the early 1620s the two newspapers often included each week the same reports from Bohemia or the Rhineland, gathered from the same German news sources; they can be more clearly differentiated in the presentation of a variety of (usually more speculative) reports towards the end of their newspapers. These reports were often based on intelligence gathered locally, and by word of mouth, from sources within the Netherlands. They were distinguished from reports from correspondents abroad by a line break in the relevant column, usually the second column of the reverse sheet (see ill. 2.3).

Whatever the quality of these final reports (and some were compiled from fragments of information picked up in The Hague or from ships arriving at the Amsterdam docks) the introduction of this news “below the line” was of some importance to the Dutch news market. It is an established assumption of the study of early newspapers that they by and large steered clear of domestic news: offering, instead, a fairly unvaried diet of news of foreign events. Some of the news “below the line”, also related to events abroad, albeit gathered from local sources; but it also offered the opportunity to smuggle into the paper a fair amount of information on Dutch matters. Later in the century this would be regularised, with reports on the second page datelined from Dutch cities, often two from The Hague and one from Amsterdam (the news from Leiden usually recorded the comings and goings of professors at the university). Here news publishers did have to tread lightly. These reports from domestic sources were by far the most likely to get them into trouble.<sup>24</sup> But it is clear that this domestic news was a service valued by their customers, and they responded accordingly.

In their first years, the two Amsterdam newspapermen relied mostly on extracting their foreign news from well-established manuscript newsletters. Stylistically there is little difference between the two: the same terse paragraphs, datelined from their place of origin, with little comment or analysis. This is certainly what established readers of the manuscript newsletters would have been used to; they were expected to be sufficiently informed to draw their own conclusions from abrupt intimations of diplomatic appointments and military manoeuvres. For neophyte readers the newspapers would have been more challenging; undoubtedly they flourished in Amsterdam because the Dutch Republic was, of all European societies, the one with the broadest cohort of politically informed and economically literate citizens. The sort of terse, elliptical reports that crammed the newspapers were critical to merchants reading the runes of international commerce. What was less predictable was how quickly newspapers became an addiction for others who had no occupational need to follow the news so closely, but were soon drawn in by the strange kaleidoscope of information laid out before them.<sup>25</sup>

From Venice, 1 June, Anno 1618.

On the 25th last there were reports of a great act of treachery discovered here, namely that a few Frenchmen, who allied themselves with the Spaniards and some nobles of this city, endeavoured to set fire to fifty buildings in the city and to loot them, after which there was found copious quantities of fireworks in the said places, which one of the accomplices revealed to the magistrates here, for which he received 25,000 ducats in reward. Upon being discovered, 700 of the culprits fled, although twenty of them were captured, and another forty have been brought in from Padua, and others are still being brought in daily from Verona, Vicenza, Bergamo and other places. Those of our nation who helped in the affair were drowned last night, while new details of the affairs are being brought to light daily, not least that the Spanish wished to take over the city entirely.

The new Doge Priuli is on the Puzentoro with twelve ships together with the Great Council, where they were escorted by four other galleys, which fired their cannon in celebration, and after having caught up, they held a large feast deep into the night. A large amount of money was spent on the instatement as well.<sup>26</sup>

This report from Venice was composed of two relatively coherent stories, but the third report in the same newspaper, datelined “Cologne, 11 June”, presented a greater variety of news bulletins concerning the tumultuous opening stages of the Thirty Years’ War:

We have news from Pressburg [Bratislava] that the tidings of the tumult of Prague have arrived here, that everything is quiet here, and that the coronation of the King of Hungary has been postponed until Bartholomew’s day.

From Vienna we have news that the diet of Prague, although a rare event, is not allowed to be spoken of; secretary Michna, who has fled from Prague, has arrived here as well. Meanwhile great preparations are made by the Defensors of the realm; Julius of Saxony has ordered the recruitment of a regiment of infantry and 2,000 cavalry; everywhere the drums are sounded.

From Germany there is news that the assembly of the union at Heilbronn, and the noble assembly at Freiburg, have passed well, and that they are inclined to peace and unity.

We have also understood that throughout Germany soldiers are being recruited; and that a few commanders arrived here, looking to recruit, but that they were turned away and had to look elsewhere, whilst all the ecclesiastical electors and bishops are also seeking to recruit soldiers.<sup>27</sup>

In due course the publishers of newspapers gradually reduced their dependence on the pre-fashioned selections of the manuscript news services, and employed their own correspondents. On the part of the correspondent this was seldom an exclusive arrangement; they might undertake to provide weekly reports for a number of papers in different parts of Europe. But for the publisher building such a network was still arduous and expensive, and finding reliable agents abroad could be extremely challenging.<sup>28</sup> It was easiest for men like Broer Jansz, with a long experience of working in the news trade, or later in the century Abraham Casteleyn, who started the famous Oprechte Haerlemse Courant after years working as a newsgatherer for Jan van Hilten. The increasing expectation that newspapers would offer a wide range of their own sources would during the century add greatly to the economic complexity of running a newspaper, and particularly of starting a new paper. This was a trade with a very high entry price.

In Amsterdam differences between the two newspapers became more pronounced in the 1630s and 1640s. An analysis of the places of correspondence featured in issues of Van Hilten's Courante and Jansz' Tijdinghen between 1636 and 1645, years for which we have a decent run of surviving issues, supports this conjecture (see fig. 2.1).<sup>29</sup> There are a few locations which feature with regularity in both newspapers. Prague, Leipzig and Paris were important news centres to both newsmen. Yet the newsgathering of Van Hilten and Jansz was clearly focused on different spheres of interest. Van Hilten's most prominent news centres were Cologne, Antwerp, London, Frankfurt and Vlissingen. He concentrated on Northern European news networks, located around the Low Countries, the North Sea and the Baltic: his most prominent southernmost place of correspondence was Vienna. Broer Jansz, on the other hand, concentrated on Southern Europe and the German heartland. Paris, Vienna, Venice, Basel, Rome, Milan, and cities like Breisach, Erfurt and Nuremberg appear frequently in his Tijdinghen. His northernmost centres are Cologne and Leipzig.

On the whole, it seems that the range of Van Hilten's sources during the 1630s and 1640s was more expansive than that of Jansz. By 1645, Van Hilten's range of places of correspondence was one of the best in Europe, rivalled only by the state-sponsored French Gazette of Théophraste Renaudot in Paris.<sup>30</sup> Yet Broer Jansz was certainly not outdone. The difference between the two ventures was one of the underlying foundations of the Amsterdam news market. Competing newspapermen could thrive because they diversified their news networks and specialised in particular theatres of news. This would become ever more evident as the Amsterdam newspaper trade expanded rapidly towards the end of the 1630s.

Serving the National Market

Jürgen Habermas, the most influential twentieth-century theorist of European information culture, claimed that a competitive commercial market for news emerged for the first time in 1695, in London.<sup>31</sup> He states that one cannot yet speak of the “routine production of news” before this period. Habermas, however, missed the developments taking place in Amsterdam during the 1640s. In 1637 Jan van Hilten and Broer Jansz were the only two newspapermen active in Amsterdam. By 1645, there would be four others. Within the space of eight years, the Amsterdam newspaper trade expanded from two to ten issues per week.

The first newcomers to the Amsterdam newspaper trade were bookseller François Lieshout (c. 1596–1646) and printer-publisher Joost Broersz (1608/1609–1647).<sup>32</sup> Lieshout started a weekly Tuesday paper in June 1638, entitled the Ordinarise Middel-weekse Courante. Broersz was a son of Broer Jansz, and by the later 1630s also published a Tuesday paper, the Ordinaris Dingsdaegse Courante. In 1648 the widow of Joost Broersz, Willemijntje Broersz (?–1661), was responsible for a weekly Saturday newspaper as well, the Saterdaeghsche Courante. Only three issues have survived, but it is possible that Broersz started this additional venture earlier.<sup>33</sup>

Another member of the Jansz family soon entered the newspaper market. Jan Jacobsz Bouman (?–1671) married Broer Jansz’s daughter in 1640, and joined the guild of St Luke in 1643 as a bookseller and printer.<sup>34</sup> In 1645 Bouman was responsible for the Extra Europische tijdingen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, a bi-weekly paper published on Mondays and Thursdays. As the name suggests, this was a paper marketed as a supplement to Broer Jansz’ Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren. With Bouman and Broersz, the Jansz family now published four issues a week, on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays. It is possible that there was extensive cooperation between Jansz, his son Joost Broersz and Bouman. When Jansz died in 1652, it was arranged that Bouman would take over the publication of the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, but that the paper would continue to bear the name of Jansz’s widow.<sup>35</sup> Bouman was required to pay the widow and heirs of Jansz 400 gulden a year for the privilege (the equivalent of around 140 annual subscriptions to the newspaper). The fact that Bouman consented to do so suggests that by this point the publication of the Tijdinghen was highly profitable.

By March 1642 the newspaper publishers had also been joined by Mathijs van Meininga (fl. 1642–1646). Probably the most obscure of the newspapermen, little is known of Van Meininga’s background or career beyond the publication of his newspaper.<sup>36</sup> Three recently discovered letters concerning Van Meininga in the Samuel Hartlib collection suggest that he was a minor noble from Friesland or Groningen who moved to Amsterdam to make a career in the news trade.<sup>37</sup> From March 1642 until the end of 1646 Van Meininga published the Europische Courant on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays. Van Meininga was the first publisher in Europe to publish a tri-weekly. Like his rivals Van Hilten and Lieshout, Van Meininga devoted himself exclusively to the now increasingly crowded news trade. By 1644 Jan van Hilten had started a second weekly newspaper, the Extraordinarie Advijzen op Donderdagh, appearing every Thursday: production had reached its zenith (see fig. 2.2).

Why did so many newspapers emerge around this time? The 1640s certainly provided plenty of news. While the Dutch Republic and its capital Amsterdam experienced a decade of relative tranquillity and prosperity, the rest of Europe was engulfed in what various scholars have characterised as an age of crisis.<sup>38</sup> Revolts against Habsburg authority in Naples, Catalonia and Portugal captivated and fascinated audiences in the Dutch state, which had after all been created by generations of war against Spain. The entry of France into the international struggle against the Spanish and Austrian Habsburgs had opened new fronts along the Rhine, and in Spain, Italy and the Southern Netherlands. The resurgence of Sweden in the Baltic electrified the European news world, and ensured that the struggle for domination in the Holy Roman Empire wore steadily on. From the mid-1640s peace negotiations at Münster and Osnabrück provided news reports when the campaigning season was long over. Most prominently, all Dutch eyes were fixed on the English Civil Wars, tearing apart the political fabric of the greatest Protestant ally of the Dutch Republic.<sup>39</sup> Jan van Hilten and Joost Broersz became true specialists of the conflict, and were able to cultivate particularly good networks of correspondents throughout the British Isles. When Van Meininga started his Europische Courant he asked the celebrated news writer Samuel Hartlib to provide a regular news bulletin from London.<sup>40</sup> He knew that a steady stream of news from the British Isles was essential if his venture was to succeed.

But these conflicts alone cannot explain why Amsterdam accommodated so many newspapers. The Amsterdam news market could expand only because the newspapers were disseminated and sold in a highly integrated national market for news, books and information. We know that Jan van Hilten despatched twelve weekly copies of his newspaper to a bookseller in Leeuwarden and twenty-six copies to a bookseller in Nijmegen.<sup>41</sup> Broer Jansz engaged an Alkmaar bookseller to take responsibility for the distribution of his Tijdinghen in that town; and the newspapers of François Lieshout and Joost Broersz were sold in Leiden from their first year of publication.<sup>42</sup> Such nuggets of information come to us from rare archival sources. However, we can use another source to discover the true extent of the national market exploited by the

Amsterdam newspapers: an analysis of advertisements placed by booksellers and publishers.<sup>43</sup>

The Amsterdam papers were precocious in their use of paid advertising.<sup>44</sup> The newspapermen were the first in Europe to encourage the use of their newspapers for the placement of notifications by fellow booksellers for forthcoming titles (see ill. 2.4). The first advertisements were placed in the early 1620s, but the practice remained marginal until the early 1630s. Yet the concept gained steadily in popularity, and around 1640 virtually every issue of the Courante uyt Italien and the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren featured at least one advertisement. This is all the more extraordinary if one considers that Flemish, English, French and German newspapers of the same period featured few, if any at all.

This issue contained two advertisements, placed (as was standard practice) at the end of the fourth column of news reports. In this issue the Dordrecht bookseller François Boels advertised a devotional tract by Joseph Hall, and the Amsterdam engraver and bookseller Salomon Savry advertised a map of the battle of the Downs, featuring a portrait of the victorious Dutch admiral, Maarten Tromp.

KUNGLIGA BIBLIOTEKET, STOCKHOLM

During the first half of the seventeenth century almost all advertisements in the Amsterdam papers were placed by members of the book trade. The surviving newspaper issues published between 1621 and 1650 offer information on over 1,200 books advertised for sale. These books were advertised by close to 200 booksellers in twenty-eight Dutch towns. This is very significant information. We can be certain that many of these booksellers will have subscribed to the weekly newspapers and sold them to their regular customers. But they would only have made the considerable investment required to pay for an advertisement in one of the Amsterdam papers if they were confident in the national reach of the papers. This, it seems, was certainly the case. The sophisticated infrastructure of the Dutch Republic ensured that readers in Middelburg, Zwolle or Franeker could buy one or several weekly newspapers from their local bookshop within a day of publication.

The wide reach of the Amsterdam newspapers explains why newspapers were slow to emerge in other Dutch cities. While newspapers appeared in at least thirty-one German towns in the first half of the seventeenth century, Amsterdam alone dominated the Dutch newspaper trade.<sup>45</sup> Before 1652, only three newspapers emerged in other Dutch cities. The first appeared in the eastern city of Arnhem. In 1619 the magistrates of the city encouraged the local printer-publisher Jan Jansz (?–1629) to start a weekly newspaper.<sup>46</sup> The magistrates had cancelled their manuscript newsletter subscription, and considered that a printed news service might prove a cheaper option. With municipal encouragement in a small, local market, the Arnhemsche Courant appeared until at least 1636, by which time it was published by Jacob van Biesen (?–1677), Jansz' son-in-law.

Around 1620 a newspaper was also started in Delft: the Courante uyt Italien, Duytsland ende Nederlandt. Unlike the Arnhem paper, this was not an independent venture. As the title suggests, the Delft paper, published by Jan Andriesz Cloeting, was closely modelled on the Amsterdam papers. Cloeting did not source many of his own reports, but largely copied news from the two Amsterdam weeklies. Cloeting published his Courante on Mondays, two days after the Van Hiltens and Broer Jansz. This gave him ample time to scour the newspapers for reports and select the most noteworthy. This was a fairly indiscriminate practice: one week Cloeting would copy more from the Tijdinghen, the next week from the Courante.<sup>47</sup> The Delft Courante was never intended for more than a local audience happy to wait an additional day to read a digest of the Amsterdam newspapers.

In Utrecht the prolific news publisher Adriaen Leenaertsz (?–1624) was also responsible for an early newspaper. His Nieuwe Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt ende Nederlant appeared from at least 1623, and offered, like the Arnhemsche Courant, an independent assortment of news sources.<sup>48</sup> Only a single copy of Leenaertsz's Nieuwe Courante has survived; indeed, it only emerged in the course of the research for this study. Through this, we know that the first paper was published in Utrecht at least thirty years earlier than previously thought. This chance survivor is therefore of great interest, not least for the glimpse it offers of the influence of the early Amsterdam newspapers. Leenaertsz's title imitated both the Amsterdam and the Delft Courante, marketing his venture as a clear alternative to the market leaders. The emergence of the newspaper had taken the Dutch news trade by storm, and Leenaertsz, a true news specialist from the early 1600s, was eager not to be left behind. While the Nieuwe Courante most likely ended with the death of Leenaertsz in 1624, the initiative is an early example of the attempt to subvert the national dominance of the Amsterdam titles.

The "Instruction for the Courantier"

Caspar van Hilten and Broer Jansz had started their newspapers in the 1610s without acknowledgement from the town council. Only in 1624 did the magistrates of Amsterdam take notice, and formally appoint Jan van Hilten and Jansz as licensed newspaper publishers. They were ordered to pay a one-off fee of 6 gulden each to the almshouse for this privilege.<sup>49</sup> The trivial nature of this nominal fee, compared to the very substantial profits to be made by the two proprietors with their national networks of customers, suggests that the magistrates had simply not grasped the commercial potential of the new news medium. It would be very different a century later when municipal authorities levied huge annual fees for the right to publish newspapers in the major Holland towns.<sup>50</sup>

The relative laxity of regulation in Amsterdam is remarkable in comparison to newspapers published elsewhere in Europe. Most, like Johann Carolus in Strasbourg in 1605 or Théophraste Renaudot in Paris from 1631, were closely connected to their respective authorities from the inception of their periodical. In Amsterdam, the council was initially slow to react. Different entrepreneurs took their chances in what was at this stage a relatively unregulated market. Thanks to the English Civil War, the final stages of the Thirty Years' War and the successes of the Dutch state in the 1630s and 1640s, there was room for at least ten issues of periodical news each week.

Such freedom was not to last. In a resolution of 11 December 1645 the burgomasters of Amsterdam noted sourly that the cost of the delivery of newspapers, pamphlets and paper to the town council came to 6,000 gulden for the year.<sup>51</sup> François Lieshout alone had been paid 428 gulden and 10 stuivers in 1642 for the delivery of news and papers.<sup>52</sup> In 1645, it is not inconceivable that the burgomasters spent similar amounts on the services of Van Hilten, Jansz, Broersz, Bouman and Van Meininga, as well as other news and pamphlet publishers. The proliferation of newspaper publishers and subscriptions had, in the eyes of the burgomasters, prompted unnecessary extravagance. In response, they proposed to regulate the delivery of newspapers.<sup>53</sup> It was not mentioned what measures were to be taken, but change was clearly on the horizon.

The excesses of the newspaper trade described by the Amsterdam burgomasters came to a definitive end in the mid-1650s. Much had changed in the years following the end of the Eighty Years' War. In the 1630s and 1640s the Dutch state had gained some of its greatest victories. Its achievements, enthusiastically covered by the competing Amsterdam titles, had lifted the Dutch Republic to the forefront of European affairs. While the Dutch had humbly begged for assistance from foreign potentates at the start of the revolt, foreign princes now requested financial support from their High Mightinesses, as the regents called themselves. But success and wealth made the Dutch all the more vulnerable to the envy of international competitors. Civil war had broken out in 1650, when Prince William II laid siege to Amsterdam; the death of William later that year saw the installation of a cautious Republican regime, wary of the pamphlet storms which the House of Orange had unleashed. When the English Commonwealth declared war on the Dutch Republic in 1652 the Dutch found their commercial profits slashed by aggressive privateering. The First Anglo-Dutch War (1652–1654) was a comprehensive defeat.

By this point only four newspapers were to be found in Amsterdam. The ventures of Mathijs van Meininga and Jan Jacobsz Bouman had disappeared, and so had the additional titles published by Jan van Hilten (the Extraordinaire Advijzen op Donderdag) and Willemijntje Broersz (the Saterdaeghsche Courante). The four remaining titles included the two oldest weeklies, the Saturday Courante uyt Italien and Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, and the two Tuesday papers established in the later 1630s, the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante and the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante.

The Amsterdam newspapers of the 1650s and 1660s have not been studied as carefully as those of the first half of the seventeenth century.<sup>54</sup> In consequence scholars have never grasped the momentous transformation of the Amsterdam news market which changed the course of the Dutch press for the remainder of the seventeenth century. Crucially, the Amsterdam burgomasters followed through on their resolution from 1645 to regulate the newspaper market. While at first sight it seems that the four Amsterdam newspapers appeared continuously throughout the 1650s and 1660s, maintaining their weekly periodicity, this was not the case. From 1654 onwards the four newspapers, under pressure from the Amsterdam magistrates, began to alternate publication. While the four newspapers remained independent ventures, one could only find two issues printed in Amsterdam each week.

This was a rather complex arrangement. On the first week of the year, the Courante uyt Italien would appear on Saturday, numbered as issue 1, followed on Tuesday by the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante, numbered as issue 1 as well. On the second week of the year the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren would appear, but numbered as issue 2. On the second Tuesday it was the turn of the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante to appear, also numbered as issue 2. The four newspapers continued to alternate in this way every year, sharing a numbering sequence throughout. When Jan van Hilten died in November 1655, his successor, Otto Barentsz Smient (1614–1689), was instructed by the burgomasters of Amsterdam to “publish the Saturday newspaper every fourteen days ... as was done by Jan van Hilten”.<sup>55</sup> This was the first time that newspapermen in the Low Countries were instructed to share a schedule of publication in this peculiar manner; indeed, it was an arrangement unique in all of Europe (not least for its complexity). Throughout Europe some of the strongest proponents of strict regulation were newspaper publishers themselves—but this does not seem to be the case in Amsterdam.<sup>56</sup> The burgomasters had found a solution which reduced the quantity of newspapers without going to the trouble of reducing the number of newspaper publishers.

A resolution adopted by the burgomasters on 16 May 1656 sheds further light on their intentions.<sup>57</sup> In the spring of 1656 Nicolaes Jacobsz (c. 1631–?), a young printer active in the small town of Weesp, requested permission to start a newspaper in Amsterdam. Jacobsz was the son-in-law of the recently deceased Jan van Hilten.<sup>58</sup> He had married Van Hilten's daughter, Celia, two months before Van Hilten's death. Jacobsz had expected, not unreasonably, to step into the shoes of his father-in-law and become the new Amsterdam courantier, but had been snubbed by the appointment of Otto Barentsz Smient to publish the title. In a defiant act Jacobsz had moved to Weesp, two hours south-east of Amsterdam by barge. In Weesp Jacobsz started a weekly Saturday newspaper: the Courante uyt Italien ende Duytsch-lant, &c., a purposeful imitation of the Amsterdam title of the same name.<sup>59</sup> Presumably Jacobsz wished to demonstrate to the burgomasters that despite his inexperience he had the means and connections to publish a weekly newspaper. Notwithstanding the evident viability of the Weesp newspaper, and the reasonable quality of its news coverage, Jacobsz's request to be allowed to move publication to Amsterdam was denied. In their resolution the burgomasters argued that there were already four newspaper publishers in Amsterdam—which, they thought, was plenty. They were probably also not particularly anxious to reward Jacobsz's calculated act of defiance. Whatever the reasons, the decision to deny Jacobsz was a turning point. The commercial opportunism of the 1640s had given way to a more cautious news culture.

While undoubtedly disappointed, Jacobsz did not give up. He continued to publish his Courante in Weesp until at least 1660. Unlike the Delft Courante of the first half of the century, Jacobsz did not copy the news published by the Amsterdam papers. Jacobsz cultivated his own sources and correspondents, and competed against the established courantiers operating in Amsterdam. His newspaper was popular enough; several Amsterdam booksellers placed advertisements for forthcoming titles in Jacobsz's newspaper within the first year of publication. In the imprint of his Courante, Jacobsz marketed himself as the "son-in-law of the late Jan Hilten, and authorised stadsdrukker of Weesp". Smient, meanwhile, changed the wording of his newspaper slightly, and italicised the words "Italien" and "Duytslant", presumably to differentiate himself from this unwelcome competitor. Shortly after this episode Smient also added a small woodcut emblem of the city of Amsterdam alongside his title.

There is no trace of Jacobsz after 1660, but he was clearly an inspirational figure. In 1665 the Amsterdam bookseller Samuel Imbrechts (1631–1679) came to an arrangement with the printer Mattijs Perfect (1620–?).<sup>60</sup> Imbrechts wished to publish a weekly newspaper, but knew that he could not do so in Amsterdam. Instead he paid Perfect to move to Weesp, where he would establish a newspaper in much the same fashion as Jacobsz had done. From February 1666 Perfect printed the Oprechte Donderdagse Courante in Weesp.<sup>61</sup> The newspaper was sold in Amsterdam at Imbrechts' shop, and the profits were shared between the two partners. While the Amsterdam burgomasters could limit the number of local publishers, they could not impede the import of other Dutch newspapers. There remained a market for more than two issues a week, and this was a market which was exploited not only by entrepreneurs like Imbrechts and Perfect, but by publishers in Haarlem, The Hague, Utrecht and Rotterdam, all of whom started newspapers in the 1650s, 1660s, and 1670s.<sup>62</sup> The dominance of Amsterdam had been broken.

The Amsterdam newspaper trade went through a further revolution in the early 1670s.<sup>63</sup> The four remaining weekly titles had thus far operated independently from one another. While the newspapermen had to alternate publication and share a numbering sequence, their newspapers maintained their individual character. The Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante, published by the ageing Sara Vlaminck (c. 1600–1669), widow of François Lieshout, was of lesser quality than the other Tuesday paper, the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante, published by Johannes (III) van Ravesteyn (1618–1681) since 1661. This meant that a subscriber to the Amsterdam titles would receive different standards of news on alternate Tuesdays.

When Sara Vlaminck died in the final days of 1669, her son-in-law, Matheus Cousaert (1630–1689), was appointed to replace her.<sup>64</sup> However, when he published his first issue in January 1670, the newspaper was entitled the Amsterdamse Dingsdaegse Courant. At exactly the same time the Saturday Courante uyt Italien published by Smient was transformed into the Amsterdamse Saturdaghe Courant. This process of standardisation continued in 1671, when Jan Jacobsz Bouman, the publisher of the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, passed away. His replacement, Casparus Commelijn (1636–1693), became the publisher on Saturdays of the Amsterdamsche Zaturdaeghe Courant. In 1672 Van Ravesteyn was the final courantier to adopt the uniform style of title: his paper became the Ordinaris Amsterdamse Dingsdaeghe Courant.

From 1673 the four newspaper publishers also featured the same woodcut emblem of the city of Amsterdam at the top of their newspapers. But the uniformity of the titles was not the only significant transformation. At the same time the four courantiers began to pool their resources. It is uncertain how this was implemented, or whether it was instigated by the publishers or the magistrates, but the newspapermen clearly shared news correspondents. The distinctions between their titles disappeared, and by the mid-1670s the four newspaper publishers were effectively working on the same venture, the Amsterdamsche Courant. In 1673 the newspaper became tri-weekly, as a third issue was added on Thursdays. Each courantier published one issue of the Thursday title every four weeks (see fig. 2.3). The newspaper had now settled on the periodicity which it would maintain into the early nineteenth century. Yet the complicated system of alternate publication would not last a decade.

In October 1682 conditions in Amsterdam changed, and the partnership of the four newspaper publishers came to an end.<sup>65</sup> Van Ravesteyn had died at the start of 1681, and it seems that Cousaert, Smient and Commelijn fell out of favour in the autumn of 1682. On 3 October the printer-publisher Adriaen (I) van Gaesbeeck (1641–1686) was appointed as the new courantier of Amsterdam. For the first time since 1618, Amsterdam had only one Dutch newspaper publisher. In January 1686 Commelijn returned as courantier, alternating publication of the tri-weekly with Van Gaesbeeck. It is uncertain how Commelijn found himself back in this position; it seems that his connections with members of the Amsterdam council may have played a part.<sup>66</sup> Unlike some of his former colleagues, Commelijn belonged to the upper level of the Amsterdam elite (see ill. 2.5). As the son of the historian and regent

Isaac Commelijn (1598–1676), Casparus enjoyed a privileged upbringing. At his death in 1693 his worth was valued at 76,296 gulden—while Matheus Cousaert, who expired in 1689, died destitute.<sup>67</sup>

Commelijn and Van Gaesbeeck worked together only for a month, as Van Gaesbeeck died in February 1686. Perhaps Van Gaesbeeck had been ill, and Commelijn was re-appointed because the magistrates were aware of Van Gaesbeeck's ailments. Now the burgomasters decided once again that it was best to have only one courantier serving the city: Commelijn alone would continue with the privilege, "excluding all others".<sup>68</sup> The newspaper was sold by bookseller Aart Dircksz Oossaan (?–1692), but produced solely by Commelijn. To the burgomasters of Amsterdam, the desire for the control of news had surpassed their appetite for diversity. It was easier to control one publisher and one paper rather than a multitude. A similar development took place in the publication of the weekly Amsterdam price and exchange lists: the number of licensed publishers of these publications declined throughout the seventeenth century from five to two.<sup>69</sup>

The burgomasters continued to increase their influence over their local paper. When Commelijn died in 1693, the lawyer Willem Arnold (1654–1723) was granted the right to publish the newspaper, in partnership with Jacomina van Duijveland (?–c. 1724), the widow of Oossaan.<sup>70</sup> It was decreed that they would divide all costs and profits equally: Arnold was tasked with the gathering of news, translation, and editing, whereas the widow would print and sell the paper. In addition, the burgomasters drafted a particular instruction for Arnold:

Instruction for the city's courantier, according to which he will regulate himself precisely.

1. That he will pay close attention, never to enter in the newspaper any news concerning the condition and composition of the navy and army of the state, which could be used to the advantage by the enemy or any other ill-intentioned parties, and lead to the disadvantage of the common good of the state.

2. That he will not mention which ships are in preparation to depart these lands, or return to these lands, nor any of the convoys, with regards to the enemy taking advantage of such information to the detriment of the subjects of this state.

3. That he will not insert in the newspaper any shocking or satirical passages regarding the Pope, cardinals or other ecclesiastical figures.

4. Likewise [he will not insert] any reports giving offence to crowned heads, princes and other potentates.

5. And [he will not insert] any general pasquilles, of whatever nature they may be.

6. And he will bear responsibility that the newspaper will not feature any news regarding the Allies of this state which might be insulting.

7. That he will not divulge through the newspaper any domestic affairs or resolutions of the state, even if they are not secret, as they are not suited to be disseminated by a public gazette.

8. Finally, that in everything, he will do his best to give no offence to any, and especially to those noble persons allied and befriended to this state.

9. And that he will perform his duties to, at all times, gather good and proper news, and not divulge any abusive tidings.<sup>71</sup>

This is an extraordinary document. It is a firm attestation of the burgomasters' perspective: the newspaper was intended to play a minor role in political society. It is unlikely that the instructions for Arnold were strictly followed. Arnold could not easily decide which reports detailing the arrival or departure of ships could impede the safety of the Dutch Republic. Europe's princes were notoriously whimsical, and might find any report describing the condition of their state to be offensive or derogatory. Instead, this document represents a legal assurance for the burgomasters of Amsterdam. It presented grounds on which they could reprimand or prosecute Arnold in the event of a complaint or mishap. There was no attempt, as in the Habsburg Netherlands, to exercise preventative censorship. Fundamentally, the instruction for the courantier asserts the precedence of the city council over the commercial enterprise of the newspaper publisher. In Habermas' public sphere the newspaper emerged from an era of repressive censorship to become a bastion of defiant opposition to the authorities. At a time when the monopoly of periodical news was broken in London, ironically under the reign of a Dutch king, a similar monopoly was reinforced in Amsterdam. In 1641 one anonymous English pamphleteer had complained that "too many places in England [are] too much Amsterdammified by several opinions".<sup>72</sup> Fifty years on the roles had changed.

Privileges, Scoundrels and Gentlemen. New Structures of the Dutch Press

On 24 April 1666 the printer-publisher Joannes Naeranus (c. 1609–1670) submitted a petition to the town council of Rotterdam: he requested permission to publish a bi-weekly newspaper.<sup>1</sup> Such newspapers, Naeranus noted, were already printed in Haarlem and Amsterdam, to the great advantage of their citizens and those of many other cities. Naeranus argued that most of the news in the Haarlem and Amsterdam newspapers travelled through Rotterdam; he claimed (optimistically) that the reports printed in Haarlem and Amsterdam on Tuesdays could be published four days earlier in Rotterdam. A local newspaper, he suggested, would much improve the commerce of the city and its neighbouring areas. Naeranus added that he had already found reliable correspondents in Italy, France, England and other regions of Europe. Faced with a reasonable request, the magistrates of Rotterdam consented to Naeranus' petition.<sup>2</sup>

The first issue of the Oprechte Rotterdamse Zee- en Post-tijdingen was published on 22 May. Naeranus had chosen an opportune moment: by May 1666 the Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667) was in full swing. After a disappointing first year of the war, the Dutch public longed for a decisive victory. Throughout the summer of 1666, two extensive naval engagements were fought against the English: both were subject to extraordinary news coverage.<sup>3</sup> In Rotterdam Naeranus was uniquely well-placed to take advantage of the news craze surrounding the war. The city was, after Amsterdam, the most important naval centre of the country, and it harboured one of the Admiralty chambers of the Republic. The citizens of Rotterdam would often be the first to know of the latest naval engagements, as ships came up the river Meuse to deliver the momentous news. Naeranus would fill his newspaper with many reports gathered “from the sea” or “from the Dutch fleet”. It was no coincidence that he called his newspaper the “Sea and post-tidings”. Prior to the establishment of the Oprechte Rotterdamse Zee- en Post-tijdingen the city of Rotterdam had become a prominent centre in the European postal network. In 1661 a direct courier service was established between England and the Dutch Republic.<sup>4</sup> The postal vessel departed from Harwich and arrived at Hellevoetsluis, 20 miles south-west from Rotterdam. The city was also in a position to profit from the intense competition between Brussels and Antwerp as postal centres in the Habsburg Netherlands. The Imperial postmaster in Brussels increasingly preferred Rotterdam as the next news hub, bypassing Antwerp altogether.<sup>5</sup>

The emergence of a newspaper in Rotterdam was a symptom of wider developments in the European postal network.<sup>6</sup> The diversity and frequency of postal routes had increased throughout Europe; in the Dutch Republic regular courier services were established with London, Danzig and Paris. As the Thirty Years' War came to an end, conflicts in the Baltic, France and Britain shifted the focus of the newspapers. Cities such as Edinburgh, Plymouth, Copenhagen, Helsingør, Danzig, Warsaw and Hamburg became new staples of the weekly papers. Meanwhile the developing metropolitan centres of Europe became ever more important news hubs: newspaper issues would increasingly feature three or four different reports from Paris, London or Vienna rather than one. Reports from distant locations like Madrid, Naples, Lisbon and Constantinople became more common whereas the traditional news centres of the German heartland, such as Prague, Regensburg, Augsburg, Breslau, Basel and Strasbourg faded from the newspapers.

The increasing sophistication of the postal network and the maturity of the periodical press had significant effects on the structure and size of Dutch newspapers. While the first newspapers featured on average nine or ten reports per issue, most issues published in the second half of the seventeenth century contained twice as many. Printers experimented with smaller typefaces and reorganised the presentation of news reports. Bi-weekly and tri-weekly schedules of publication became the norm. The decline of the Amsterdam newspapers in the 1650s gave rise to new titles in The Hague, Haarlem, Weesp, Utrecht, Rotterdam and Leiden. Yet it was a Haarlem paper, the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant, published from 1656 by Abraham Casteleyn, which emerged to fill the gap left by the decline of the Amsterdam papers: in the second half of the seventeenth century it would become one of Europe's most acclaimed papers, before the appearance of the famous Gazette de Leyde. As newspapers came to play a more prominent role in the political culture of the Dutch Republic, Dutch authorities began to take a greater interest in the regulation of the newspaper trade while publishers adapted to their changing role within the local municipality. These developments were to define the structures of the Dutch press for the remainder of the seventeenth century, and well into the eighteenth.

News at the Heart of the State

In his petition of 1666 Joannes Naeranus had highlighted Haarlem and Amsterdam as the two chief centres of newspaper publication. He had, however, missed one vibrant news hub: The Hague. A decade before Naeranus' request, multiple short-lived newspapers had emerged in The Hague. By 1666 only one bi-weekly newspaper remained, but the previous decade had witnessed an expansion of the news market evocative of the rapid changes taking place in Amsterdam in the 1640s. The Hague was a melting pot of international trends and traditions in the presentation of news; it would have a profound impact on the newspaper trade.

The Hague was the political capital of the Dutch Republic. A small city without walls, it supported the leading political institutions of the state, which were clustered in and around a central complex, the Binnenhof. Foreign agents and ambassadors, as well as dignitaries from Dutch towns and provincial assemblies contributed to a constant hubbub of gossip, news and intelligence. The concentration of political information attracted ambitious businessmen. The Hague was the home of leading writers and artists of the Republic. Authors found a ready market for their texts: in 1600 there were only seven booksellers, printers and engravers active in The Hague, but by the 1650s there were at least seventy-one.<sup>7</sup> Some, like the lawyer and diplomat Lieuwe van Aitzema, took advantage of the congregation of statesmen, foreign agents and artisans to engage in overlapping activities: history writing, news distribution and espionage. Between 1646 and 1649, Van Aitzema spent over 556 gulden on books, pamphlets and newspapers in The Hague in his capacity as agent for the Duke of Braunschweig-Lüneburg.<sup>8</sup> Hundreds of seventeenth-century Dutch newspapers can still be found today in the Herzog August library in Wolfenbüttel, for the most part emanating from the formidable collection assembled by Duke August the Younger (1579–1666).

Local authorities provided even better business. Already from 1604 onwards several booksellers in The Hague supplied printed and manuscript news to the Court of Holland.<sup>9</sup> The delivery of books, stationery, pamphlets and periodicals would make Aert Meuris and the Van Wouws some of the richest individuals in The Hague.<sup>10</sup> A variety of administrative and political departments provided the bulk of the business for specialist suppliers such as Isaac Burchoorn and Jan Vely: between 1637 and 1650 Vely was paid more than 1,800 gulden by the Treasury for the supply of newspapers and other printed matter, and another 1,150 gulden by the High Court.<sup>11</sup> The news trade in The Hague was dependent on the institutions of state for its commercial success.<sup>12</sup> Most booksellers practiced their trade at the heart of the state, selling their wares from a stall in the Great Hall of the Binnenhof (see ill. 3.1).

For much of the early seventeenth century the booksellers of The Hague were content to furnish newspapers from Amsterdam for their customers. It was no great distance from Amsterdam to The Hague: what was published in Amsterdam in the morning could find its way to The Hague by the afternoon. After the expansion of the Amsterdam news market in the later 1630s the newspaper readers of The Hague were spoilt for choice. But with the decline of the Amsterdam newspaper trade a decade later, several entrepreneurs in The Hague took the chance to provide news serials printed locally, with a style remarkably different from the standards set in Amsterdam.

The establishment of the first news series in The Hague was stimulated by the final stages of the English Civil War. During the later 1640s The Hague became the home of the English court in exile, and accommodated many Royalist refugees.<sup>13</sup> Foreign writers, readers and publishers flocked to The Hague. The denouement of the Thirty Years' War and the crisis of the Fronde in France attracted even more visitors. The news culture of The Hague was infused by international tastes and practices. While the influence of Dutch newspapers on early English periodical culture is well recognised, the reverse process—the influence of English news series in the Dutch Republic—played a significant role in the 1640s and 1650s.<sup>14</sup>

The first publisher to try his luck with a weekly serial was an Englishman, Samuel Browne (1611–1665).<sup>15</sup> A London printer, he fled England in the mid-1640s and settled in The Hague.<sup>16</sup> By 1647 he had his own print shop, which was responsible for a large proportion of Royalist publications in the Dutch Republic, including many news reports, speeches and resolutions emanating from the conflict in Britain.<sup>17</sup> In 1648 Browne began the Mercurius Anglo-Britannus, a news serial which included reports from “various parts of England, Scotland and Ireland, concerning the King, the Parliament and the three Kingdoms”.<sup>18</sup> In

1649 he also published Le Mercure Anglois, presumably a French translation of the Dutch Mercurius. Only two issues of the Dutch serial have survived, and Le Mercure Anglois is known only for 1649; but it is likely that both serials were published concurrently, between 1648 and 1651. Indeed, from 1648 onwards Browne delivered “English newspapers” to the High Court and to the States General.<sup>19</sup>

Browne’s serials imitated the periodical newsbooks published in Britain during the 1640s.<sup>20</sup> Instead of presenting news reports with a geographical heading (“from Rome”, “from Vienna”), Browne provided a digest of reports divided by the days of the week, without listing their respective origins. This was a style familiar to Browne from London: by maintaining the same format of publication on the continent, the presentation of the English Civil War beyond the British Isles was closely tied to the distinctive English newsbook format. All reports in his 1648 and 1649 serials focused on developments in Britain. Browne adopted a distinctly pro-Royalist tone, concentrating in Le Mercure Anglois of 1649 exclusively on the events leading up to Charles I’s execution.

During the First Anglo-Dutch War (1652–1654) Browne continued his denunciations of the Commonwealth regime. On 6 January 1653, Browne commenced a new publication: the Noodig, Continueerlick Acht-Dagen-Nieus. In the first issue of this newspaper Browne clarified the purpose of the venture:

Given that there are many things waiting to be brought to light, which the other newspapers neglect to mention, regarding the affairs between the States General and the ruling party in England, so I have decided to enlighten you and show you some of this [information] every Monday, of which you will find nothing, or very few things, which the others [newspapers] have.<sup>21</sup>

Browne’s emphasis on the exclusive information offered by his new serial may have been prompted by the fact that by this point Browne faced competition from another publisher taking advantage of the political developments in England and France. In April 1652 a weekly newspaper entitled Wekelycke Nieus uyt Vranckryck Engellant ende andre Plaetsen was published anonymously in The Hague: its imprint stated only that it was to be found in the Great Hall.<sup>22</sup> Like Browne’s periodicals, it was published as a pamphlet of eight pages, featuring a title-page with a woodcut vignette.

Between 1652 and 1653 the Wekelycke Nieus was wholly dedicated to news from England and France. The only reports placed in the newspaper were sourced from London, Paris and The Hague. The eight pages of the Wekelycke Nieus were rarely filled: the second, seventh and eighth pages were frequently blank. The weekly report from London was often delayed, with the publisher forced to state only that the “letters from London have not yet arrived”. This was a particular problem with English news, that contrary winds in the Channel could prevent the postal packets from sailing. Of course, the reverse problem was even more acute for English newsmen, since a severe westerly win could cut them off from all sources of continental news.

The Wekelycke Nieus catered to interest in the Anglo-Dutch War and the Fronde—but its publisher had limited contacts, and was not able to develop a wider network of correspondents. He was also cautious: only on 13 June 1652, with the publication of issue 10, did Johannes Rammazeyn (c. 1619–1693) reveal his name on the imprint.<sup>23</sup> On 27 February 1653 Rammazeyn’s name disappeared once more. Now the fortunes of the Wekelycke Nieus improved, as it was taken over by the scholar, mathematician and bookseller Adriaen Vlacq (1600–1667). While his name only appeared on the publication from March 1654 onwards, the woodcut vignette on the title-page of the Wekelycke Nieus was changed on 24 April 1653. The range of sources expanded. Reports from London and Paris remained a staple, but Vlacq added regular correspondence from Milan, Turin, Hamburg, Naples, Rome, Danzig and Brussels. Like his predecessor Rammazeyn, Vlacq was from Gouda. He had been a partner of Johannes Rammazeyn’s father, a connection which may have given weight to his request to take over the newspaper.<sup>24</sup> Vlacq had also worked extensively as a bookseller in England and France, where he must have been familiar with the quarto pamphlet format of news serials.

In order to facilitate the distribution of his newspaper, Vlacq came to an arrangement with the Amsterdam bookseller Gillis Joosten Saeghman.<sup>25</sup> The details of their agreement are unknown, but several variant issues of the Wekelycke Nieuws have survived from 1653 and 1654 documenting their arrangement. These variants carry a different imprint: "In The Hague, printed for Gillis Joosten, printer in the Nieuwestraat." Although only eight issues of the Saeghman variant have survived, it is likely that the entire print run of the newspaper was divided between the two publishers from the start of Vlacq's tenure as courantier. The expansion into the Amsterdam market was carefully timed: Vlacq and Saeghman made their arrangement at almost exactly the time that the magistrates of Amsterdam decided to restrict their local periodical production to two issues per week.

In January 1656 Vlacq changed the name and periodicity of his newspaper. It was now called the Post-tydingen uyt 'sGraven-Hage, published twice a week on Tuesdays and Fridays, and from 1657 on Mondays and Thursdays.<sup>26</sup> Vlacq announced this change to the reader on the first issue of the rebranded periodical:

Advertisement. For the convenience and benefit of those interested in new tidings, we have decided to circulate our post-tidings from now on in a half sheet of paper; this will nevertheless contain just as much news as there was presented on a full sheet; and in quarto rather than in any other format, so that those who wish to gather up [the issues] will be able to bind them together at the end of the year, and keep them as a history of what has passed; even if not all will be accurate, at least it will please some curious persons; as we could do no more than to gather together whatever has come to us through good intelligence, in no manner expecting that we will be able to please everyone, for if we could, then we would disappoint nobody.<sup>27</sup>

It was common practice in England, France and the Holy Roman Empire to bind together issues of a periodical at the end of each year in order to create a contemporary historical account. In the Dutch Republic this practice was not as common, and the quarto format maintained by Vlacq is clear evidence of the influence of foreign practices and styles. His shift to a four-page bi-weekly newspaper was also shrewd. By publishing on Mondays and Thursdays Vlacq gave himself a significant advantage in the Amsterdam market, as his issues would arrive in Amsterdam on the same day that the local papers went to the press. Vlacq published his Post-tydingen until 1662; by 1663 he was in charge of a new periodical, entitled the Haegse Post-Tydingen. This venture was established in partnership with the Amsterdam bookseller Pieter Aertsen: the two men agreed that Vlacq would print the newspaper "in the format and manner of the Amsterdam and Haarlem newspapers", and would deliver half of the print run to Aertsen.<sup>28</sup> All costs of production and profit were split equally. The Haegse Post-Tydingen was indeed published in the half-sheet folio format of the Amsterdam newspapers. Vlacq had found that in order to compete more successfully in the Amsterdam market it was important to depart from the quarto style and adopt the usual standard format of newspapers in the Dutch Republic.

While Vlacq adapted over time, other newspapermen were not so successful. The plight of the newspapermen in The Hague was closely related to the whims of the authorities. The fact that the Wekelycke Nieuws and later also the Post-tydingen uyt 'sGraven-Hage were published without their publishers' name for several stretches indicates that Rammazeyn and Vlacq knew they were operating in a precarious market.<sup>29</sup> Samuel Browne, the first newspaper publisher in The Hague, was also the first to be pursued. On 4 March 1651 he was banned from The Hague and fined 1,000 gulden, an enormous sum quite beyond Browne's means, after publishing a polemical Royalist pamphlet.<sup>30</sup> Thankfully for Browne, the ban was repealed, and the States General and the Council of State even ordered several dozen copies of the pamphlet for their own use.<sup>31</sup>

This episode illuminates a fundamental paradox of the news trade in The Hague. The news market in the city cannot be made to fit a model of oppressive authority seeking to limit the development of a popular press; but it also does not conform to a Habermasian ideal of a free public sphere operating independently of the state. Instead, one sees here that the state is deeply involved in the process of periodical news: primarily as consumer, but also as a regulator responding to political forces beyond the market place. It is likely that Browne's sentence was passed only to pacify the Cromwellian legation in The Hague, with whom the States were eager to avoid the hostilities which would erupt next year. Browne was not expelled from The Hague in 1651, and the statesmen of the Dutch Republic continued to buy his publications. However, Browne's first true newspaper, the Noodig, Continueerlick Acht-Dagen-Nieuws, was banned after only thirteen issues in March 1653, as indicated in contemporary manuscript annotation on the final extant issue.<sup>32</sup> Apparently Browne's Royalist stance in the middle of the Anglo-Dutch War proved too reckless for the local regents. Browne fled The Hague for Heidelberg, where he became the university printer.<sup>33</sup>

Crispijn Hoeckwater (1642–1731), the publisher of the Haegse Post-Tydingen after the death of Adriaen Vlacq in 1667, also found himself in frequent trouble.<sup>34</sup> A month after he took over the newspaper he was fined 1,200 gulden by the Court of Holland for the publication in his paper of a speculative article on the peace negotiations at Breda and the role of the Dutch in mediation between France and Spain.<sup>35</sup> When questioned where he obtained the news, Hoeckwater alleged that he had heard it himself at the Court, which he frequented daily in order to gather snippets of news. Publication of the newspaper was suspended for six weeks. In 1674 Hoeckwater would receive a six-month publishing ban, later reduced to two months, again for the publication of a "seditious report".<sup>36</sup> Hoeckwater was also investigated for the publication of seditious pamphlets in 1669, 1672 and 1679, and any trace of his newspaper disappears after 1677.

The most outlandish figure of the Dutch periodical trade arrived in The Hague in 1654. Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht (c. 1622–1698) was born in Ghent, and styled himself "Lord of Maldegommerstraet, ter Clock, Oxelaer, and St Aldegonde".<sup>37</sup> He married in The Hague in 1646, and lodged in castle Westerbeek, on the outskirts of the town (see ill. 3.2).

Van der Macht's name never appeared on any publication in The Hague. Unlike other Dutch newspaper publishers, Van der Macht intended to hide his identity, and devoted his time to news gathering. Van der Macht employed Johannes Rammazeyn, the former publisher of the Wekelycke Nieuws, for his first venture. On 22 May 1654 the first issue of the Wekelycke Mercurius van alle het gedenckwaerdigste dat door geheel Europa passeert was published. The Wekelycke Mercurius was a substantial newspaper, composed of sixteen pages in quarto, and was filled with an average of twenty-nine news reports per issue (compared to a meagre eight or nine published in Vlacq's Post-tydingen). True to the title, the reports were sourced from the entire breadth of Europe. A typical issue of the Wekelycke Mercurius included several reports from the Mediterranean (often starting with Constantinople), four or five reports from Italy, several from the British Isles, five from France, seven or eight reports from the Baltic and the Holy Roman Empire, and several reports from the Low Countries.

By the twelfth issue of the Wekelycke Mercurius Rammazeyn's name disappeared from the imprint; the thirteenth issue of 21 August 1654 was the last to appear. Van der Macht turned to another printer with a colourful history: Willem Breeckvelt (c. 1625–?). Well known to the authorities, Breeckvelt had come to their attention in 1650 after publishing various polemic pamphlets during the siege of Amsterdam in support of the city's foe, Stadhouder William II of Orange. These included the shockingly incendiary Articulen geslooten ende geacordeert tusschen de Republycque van Engelandt en de stad Amsterdam, which claimed that the city of Amsterdam had signed a secret pact of alliance with the Cromwellian regime.<sup>38</sup> In the heightened political atmosphere of the time, Breeckvelt was arrested and interrogated under torture.

Van der Macht wasted little time, and the first issue of the Haegsche Weekelycke Mercurius, printed by Breeckvelt, was published on 4 September 1654 (see ill. 3.3). Almost identical in title to Rammazeyn's banned newspaper, the new periodical was published on one sheet in quarto (with a total of eight pages). It can be identified clearly as Van der Macht's publication given the similarity in the sources presented in the newspapers printed by Rammazeyn and Breeckvelt. Almost every issue opens with news from Constantinople, Sicily and the Italian peninsula, followed by news predominantly from Britain and France. Even with eight fewer pages, Van der Macht managed to fit in reports from over twenty different places in each issue. Breeckvelt lasted longer than Rammazeyn in his capacity as printer for Van der Macht: his newspaper was banned by July 1655.<sup>39</sup> The exact reason for the ban is unclear, but Van der Macht's tendency to sensationalise and fabricate news, as well as his use of material gleaned from the civil servants of the Court of Holland and other administrative bodies were surely contributing factors.

Only a couple of weeks after the demise of Breeckvelt's newspaper Van der Macht started a new version of the Haegsche Weekelycke Mercurius. The imprint hinted for the first time at Van der Macht's role: "In The Hague, printed for the author". For this initiative he turned to two other members of the book trade: Christianus Calaminus (fl. 1632–1658) and Hendrik (II) Hondius (1615–1677). Calaminus printed Van der Macht's periodical, while Hondius was in charge of its distribution and sale. The contract between Hondius and Van der Macht stipulated that Hondius would pay Van der Macht one stuiver for each issue delivered to him; that Hondius would sell the newspaper for two stuivers; and that Hondius would pay Van der Macht another half stuiver for each issue sold.<sup>40</sup>

The price of the new Haegsche Weekelycke Mercurius was double that of the weekly Amsterdam papers, but the price also reflected an increase in Van der Macht's investments. Instead of a single weekly issue of eight pages, Van der Macht's newspaper was published as a bi-weekly on Mondays and Thursdays (from 1656), and also included irregular numbered news pamphlets elaborating on specific news stories. The combined weekly print run would on average top twenty pages of news.

Van der Macht's customers could also expect a certain exclusivity: he continued to frequent the offices of government, where he was supplied with classified diplomatic news and resolutions. In September 1657 an investigation was initiated against several clerks of the Court of Holland who had fallen under suspicion because of their associations with Van der Macht.<sup>41</sup> Van der Macht knew that he was subject to investigation, and in 1658 he started using the pseudonym "Anthoni Pieters" on his publications. This rather charming subterfuge achieved little: on 5 April 1658 the Court of Holland handed Van der Macht a ten-year ban from Holland, requiring him to leave The Hague within twenty-four hours and to leave the boundaries of Holland within three days. The sentence justified the decision in full. Van der Macht had testified in a hearing on 13 March that he had received a certain letter from Copenhagen, dated from 26 February, which contained amongst other things news that the King of Sweden, after two furious attacks on the same town, was beaten off, with the loss of four regiments; which letter he communicated to various delegates of the States General, with the singular assurance that the original letter was truthfully written by Resident Le Maire, and that he had sent the same to Middelburg, to a certain regent in the government there; which is found to be false and fabricated ... as the said letter was written by a certain Del Mair, and not by the Resident Le Maire ... All of which is business resulting from most malignant intentions, including the abuse of the state and its ordinances against licentious printing.<sup>42</sup>

<sup>42</sup> Cited in Sautijn Kluit, 'De 's Gravenhaagsche Courant', pp. 13–15. Also ARA, archief Hof van Holland, inv. 5258.14.

The sentence highlighted the printing of false news and perjury as Van der Macht's greatest crimes, but it is certain that the exploitation of his connections at the centre of government was the main cause for his expulsion from The Hague.

Van der Macht quickly settled in the nearby city of Utrecht, then without a local courantier. Here Van der Macht continued his venture: by the end of June the bi-weekly Utrecht Mercurius, complemented with irregular news pamphlets, was published under the pseudonym of "Anthoni Benedicti". The pseudonym was a superficial veil, and Van der Macht's identity was widely known. Both Otto Barentsz Smient in Amsterdam and Joannes Naeranus in Rotterdam printed attacks on Van der Macht in their newspapers. Smient reprinted the sentence handed out to Van der Macht on 12 July 1659 in his Courante uyt Italien after Van der Macht insulted Smient in his newspaper. Smient stated that he wished the magistrates of Utrecht to know that they were served by a dishonest man.<sup>43</sup> Naeranus published a statement on 18 September 1666 declaring that Van der Macht had printed in his Mercurius a report that Naeranus was pursued by the authorities. Naeranus denied the report, stating that “Lodewijk de Macht, the Mercurius printer at Utrecht banned from Holland ... prints under another name, [as] he does not dare to use his own name on his post-tidings or anything he publishes, because they are all seditious and false letters.”<sup>44</sup>

These anecdotes demonstrate that Van der Macht continued to impact upon the wider news trade from the relative safety of Utrecht. He sold his periodical in The Hague with the help of several of his old contacts, including his former vendor, Hondius.<sup>45</sup> Van der Macht's flamboyant career lasted until December 1669, when he was banned from Utrecht and Holland for life after several warnings by the local magistrates and a lengthy investigation by the Court of Holland.<sup>46</sup> Now, the Dutch newspaper industry was to be guided by a different force.

The Gentleman-Publisher of Haarlem

In 1645, at the height of Amsterdam's dominant position as a centre of news, the city of Haarlem seemed an unlikely competitor. Twenty years later there was little doubt that Haarlem, around twelve miles west of Amsterdam, was the new periodical centre of the Dutch Republic. This was primarily due to the efforts of Abraham Casteleyn (1628–1681), the son of the stadsdrukker of Haarlem, Vincent (I) Casteleyn.<sup>47</sup>

Abraham Casteleyn printed the first issue of his newspaper, the Weeckelijcke Courante van Europa, on Saturday 8 January 1656. To publicise the new venture, Casteleyn sent free copies of the first issue to potential customers throughout the country, adding a small printed notification in which he advertised his newspaper (see ill. 3.4):

Sir. The falseness of the newspapers which nowadays inform us of the movements of this troubled world, had motivated me, on behalf of some interested persons and for my own satisfaction, to write for special newsletters from the most important places in Europe, a process which has not been possible without some trouble and expense. The late Mr Jan van

Hilten asked me, when he saw these [newsletters] at my house, to put them or something from them at his service every week, a thing which I did now and again and which made his newspapers better than those of the others. But after Mr van Hilten died [in November 1655], I judged it best no longer to remain a slave of others, and print news for myself, despite other courantiers requesting my newsletters ...<sup>48</sup>

Casteleyn hoped that customers would favour his new venture if they had hitherto bought Van Hilten's newspaper, the Courante uyt Italien. This bold and ambitious publicity strategy, the only surviving example of such a document from the seventeenth-century Dutch press, also offers us a vital clue to Casteleyn's previous experience as journalist before the launch of his own paper. It is not known how long Casteleyn worked in this capacity, supplying Jan van Hilten with news, but it is unlikely to have been more than ten years—when he started his own newspaper in 1656 Casteleyn was around twenty-eight years old. The previous success of the news market in Amsterdam was dependent on news writers like Casteleyn, who played a vital, if largely anonymous role in sustaining a competitive news centre. Now he would be applying this expertise to create his own competing venture in Haarlem.

In the summer of 1658, Casteleyn started a second weekly edition, published on Tuesdays: the Haerlemse Dingsdaegse Courant. The name of the Weeckelijcke Courante van Europa was changed at the start of 1659 to the Haerlemse Saterdagse Courant; Casteleyn was in the process of creating a uniform brand. A further change occurred in 1662, when Casteleyn added the word Oprechte (Authentic) to the start of the title. On 16 September 1664 Abraham Casteleyn complained to the magistrates of Haarlem that his brothers Johannes and Pieter and his cousin Vincent (II) Casteleyn printed and distributed “news and post-tidings”, much to the detriment of Casteleyn's business.<sup>49</sup> The change in title had perhaps served to warn his relatives of Abraham's privilege as courantier.

On 9 June 1667 Casteleyn made a final change to his newspaper. He began to print a Thursday edition, the Extraordinaire Donderdaegse Haerlemse Courant. This issue contained a notification that “this is the first time that I present you with this extraordinary, so that you will not have to wait until Saturday”.<sup>50</sup> It was, however, not a special issue, as the use of the word extraordinary might seem to imply, but a permanent addition to Casteleyn's newspaper. Casteleyn was only the second newspapermen in the Dutch Republic to publish a tri-weekly (after Mathijs van Meininga's Amsterdam Europische Courant). It required considerable effort to furnish enough news to fill a tri-weekly paper: Casteleyn's Thursday issues always contained fewer news reports. It also proved challenging to find enough customers to purchase all three issues. Well into the eighteenth century it remained common for newspaper readers to subscribe to only one or two issues of a tri-weekly, rather than buy all three.<sup>51</sup> The Thursday issue was almost always the poor relation, as booksellers were well aware. By the mid-1660s Casteleyn's Tuesday and Saturday issues contained at least one or two advertisements each week, but it took almost thirty years for the Thursday issue to achieve similar popularity with advertisers.

Casteleyn's newspaper was a pioneer of the Dutch news trade. He copied the half-sheet folio format and design of the Amsterdam newspapers, and for his title opted for the “Courant” favoured by Amsterdam, rather than the “Mercurius” or “Post-tydingen” prevalent in The Hague, Utrecht and Rotterdam. But Casteleyn was by no means just an imitator. For his new paper, clearly carefully prepared and well financed, he introduced several significant innovations with lasting impact on the whole Dutch newspaper trade. Any reader would immediately have been impressed by the quality of his network of correspondents. Casteleyn presented an unprecedented quantity of news each week, still using the same double-sided sheet as the well-established Amsterdam papers. In the 1650s and 1660s issues of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant featured on average around twenty-one reports per issue, whereas the four Amsterdam newspapers of the same two decades featured only around fifteen.<sup>52</sup>

In order to fit this considerable number of news reports into the available space, Casteleyn experimented with the design of the news columns and the typeface. Until the 1650s Dutch newspapers had been presented largely in a black letter typeface. Casteleyn was the first publisher to use a smaller roman typeface for most of his reports. From 9 March 1673 onwards issues of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant were printed exclusively in a roman typeface.<sup>53</sup> As a result, the total word count of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant increased while Casteleyn did not use up any additional paper. Whereas the Amsterdam newspapers of the 1640s would present around 2,100 words per issue, Casteleyn was able to fit at least 3,000 words in each weekly issue a decade later, rising steadily to the end of the century to around 4,000 words per issue.

The smaller typefaces were visually less attractive, and created a cluttered appearance. In order to guide the reader through the dense text, Casteleyn introduced a new structure. Casteleyn grouped reports by their geographical origin, and placed a large header above each section: "Italy", "Germany and neighbouring territories", "Poland & Prussia", "England", "France", and "the Netherlands". This was a significant change from the first half of the seventeenth century, when newspaper reports were presented in a chronological order, placing the oldest report at the top of the first column, and the most recent report at the end of the second column on the back page. Casteleyn first featured these geographical headers in his Weeke-lijke Courante van Europa in the later 1650s, and by the end of the 1660s other newspaper publishers throughout the Dutch Republic were implementing similar changes.

Casteleyn's rivals followed his lead in making this major design change because the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant had proved to be such a success. On 10 February 1666 Johan Boreel, delegate to the Dutch fleet, asked Roeland van Kinschot, councillor of the High Court of Holland, to "write to me of everything, as we hear many things, albeit with little certainty, and I hold the Haarlem newspaper for the best."<sup>54</sup> Casteleyn, with his background as a news writer, was extremely well-connected and maintained correspondence with some of the most powerful and informed statesmen and agents throughout Europe. He exchanged news with men such as Giovanni Salvetti, the ambassador of the Duke of Tuscany in London, and Otto Callenfels, deputy to the Danish ambassador in The Hague.<sup>55</sup> Callenfels sent Casteleyn confidential memoranda and resolutions from The Hague several times a week, and received a payment of sixteen stuivers for each handwritten sheet—the equivalent of the sale of sixteen copies of Casteleyn's newspaper.<sup>56</sup> Casteleyn's news network was unrivalled by any other seventeenth-century courrantier in the Dutch Republic.

Casteleyn was certainly not content to supply his newspapers only to a local readership in Haarlem, a city of around 40,000 inhabitants. In fact, he aspired to a national readership, and soon usurped the hitherto dominant position of the Amsterdam newspapers in this respect. This was a gradual change, but one with considerable impact. By the 1730s only 10% of the print run of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant was sold in Haarlem.<sup>57</sup> The majority of copies were sold in Amsterdam, The Hague, Leiden, and other Holland towns; but the newspaper was also supplied to postmasters and booksellers on the borders of the country and in the Southern Netherlands. In contrast, the tri-weekly Amsterdamsche Courant of the same period sold around 80% of its print run locally.<sup>58</sup>

We can be certain that the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant circulated widely throughout the Dutch Republic within a decade after its first appearance. During the 1660s and 1670s the newspaper featured advertisements from booksellers and publishers from thirty-six different towns.<sup>59</sup> The Haarlem newspaper seems to have become a favoured medium of communication amongst booksellers; any serious publisher was expected to subscribe to the newspaper to keep track of his competitors' activities. In 1687 the Amsterdam publisher Pieter Arentsz was prosecuted by Isaac Naeranus of Rotterdam for infringing upon his privilege by publishing a new edition of Camphuy-sen's Stichtelijke Rijmen.<sup>60</sup> To support his case Arentsz cited several advertisements placed by Naeranus in the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant, stating that Naeranus had not referred to his privilege in these advertisements.

Casteleyn's paper had considerable impact abroad. Today the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant is found in large quantities in English, German, Swedish and Russian archives and libraries. By 1660 handwritten translations of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant circulated widely at the Russian court.<sup>61</sup> The Haarlem paper was especially sought after in England. It was appreciated not only for the general quality of its news, but for the alternative voice it provided, subverting the monopoly of the government-sponsored London Gazette. The Oprechte Haerlemse Courant was standard literature in Whig circles, and could be found in many London coffeehouses. The proprietors of such establishments also acted as news agents for the distribution of the Haarlem paper. In August 1677 one coffeehouse provided between one and eight copies of the newspaper for thirteen regular customers.<sup>62</sup> The Dutch newspaper was so popular that at least four different series of printed English translations appeared from 1679 onwards.<sup>63</sup> The earliest known translation, The Haerlem Courant, featured an announcement in its second issue that

A person of much leisure has undertaken to render into English the Haerlem Gazettes; which having the best repute of all that are foreign, it is hoped may contribute much to the satisfying the curiosity of such, as are not only desirous to be acquainted with the actions abroad, but the accounts that are given of the occurrences here ...<sup>64</sup>

The Compleat Mercury; or, The Haerlem Courant, Truly Rendered into English (1681) noted in its third and fourth issues that

The Spring drawing on, and extraordinary preparations being made by all our Neighbours, both by Sea and Land, Our thoughts tending to have some light into the Affairs abroad, as well as those at home, it was believed by the undertaker that nothing could give you a better prospect of things than the Haerlem Gazette, which having the greatest vogue of all that are foreign, will (without doubt) contribute more to the satisfying every one's curiosity, than all that are extant ...<sup>65</sup>

The publisher of The Harlem's Courant (1695) stated that "The Harlem's Courant being so much approved by all inquisitive Persons, I think a translation of the same, will be very acceptable; and therefore I intend to translate it constantly, as soon as the Post comes."<sup>66</sup> It was common throughout Europe for newspapermen to copy the content of other newspapers—but these translations indicate that London publishers were copying the Casteleyn brand. In a short satirical periodical entitled The Weekly Comedy: or the Humours of a Coffee-House (1707), a variety of characters discuss the events of the day in a coffeehouse; the news writer in the company is named "Harlem".<sup>67</sup>

English statesmen frequently complained of the critical or subversive reports printed in the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant.<sup>68</sup> The English ambassador in The Hague, Sir George Downing, complained in November 1663 that Casteleyn "always prints all vile news against His Majesty".<sup>69</sup> A year later he noted that "the Haarlem gazetteer very often takes the liberty of decrying infamously His Majesty and his affairs; the last week he printed that whereas Cromwell could in a week have gotten 1,200 seamen in the town of Yarmouth that His Majesty could not in much more time get above 200."<sup>70</sup> Yet as Jason Peacey has demonstrated, English statesmen were not averse to establishing a working relationship with the Haarlem courantier. Casteleyn may on occasion have been publicly critical of English affairs in his weekly issues, but he also supplied the English under-secretary of state, Joseph Williamson (1633–1701), with some of his best intelligence—and received valuable news in return.

Williamson had been the driving force behind the creation of The London Gazette in 1665, and played an active role in news gathering. He maintained dozens of regular contacts throughout Britain, many of them postmasters. He used their information to compose an exclusive manuscript newsletter, which he exchanged with foreign news writers and publishers for their foreign news; these foreign reports he then used for the London Gazette and other handwritten news services.<sup>71</sup> News was a currency best exchanged with other publishers; Casteleyn and Williamson exchanged reports in correspondence on a weekly basis.<sup>72</sup> Ben Jonson, in his satirical play The Staple of News (1625) already emphasised the diplomat's role as a news agent. When Pennyboy Junior asks two employees of the news staple (Thomas and Fashioner) what emissaries do, they reply that emissaries are

abroad / To fetch in the commodity Fashioner: From all the regions / Where the best news are made—
Thomas: Or vented forth /
Fashioner: By way of exchange or trade.<sup>73</sup>

Over a hundred letters written by Casteleyn to Williamson have survived in the National Archives in Kew.<sup>74</sup> The newsletters focus on movements of the Dutch army, the Dutch admiralties, and the activities of the Dutch fleet. Casteleyn also added other continental news which came to his attention, but news regarding Dutch military preparations and state resolutions was the most valuable to Williamson. These newsletters were highly compromising. The two men communicated throughout the Second Anglo-Dutch War, an act akin to treason. The Court of Holland had pursued Van der Macht and later Naeranus for the publication of classified domestic intelligence. The instruction of the Amsterdam burgomasters to Willem Arnold, publisher of the Amsterdamsche Courant from 1693 onwards, strictly forbade the publication of news regarding the Dutch fleet and armed forces. It is no surprise that Williamson hid his correspondence with Casteleyn in his account books under pseudonyms: "Sir David" or "Sir David Frank, broker in Amsterdam".<sup>75</sup> George Downing was certainly aware of the exchanges between Williamson and Casteleyn, for he wrote back to England in November 1663 "pray tell Mr Williamson that always, word for word, I find in this gazette [the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant] the same news he sends me."<sup>76</sup>

The Oprechte Haerlemse Courant achieved its international reputation only through considerable risk to Casteleyn's business. The popularity of the newspaper rested on the success of Casteleyn not only as a publisher, but as a news writer and a news broker. He served as an agent for multiple parties, often competing with one another for favourable public coverage. While Casteleyn furnished the English state with valuable intelligence, he also served as a medium of communication for the Dutch States General. Gijsbert van der Hoolck, delegate to the States General, wrote to Dr Cornelis Booth from The Hague on 20 May 1672 that he attached

A copy of the resolution, by which the English and Scottish merchants are to be returned their impounded goods and ships. Your Excellency will be interested to see the same inserted in the Thursday Haarlem newspaper, not without knowledge of us; similarly you will see in the Saturday newspaper, in some different words, the same message reiterated, in order to make it all known to the world: it will undoubtedly make a good impression in the British nation.<sup>77</sup>

Indeed, one finds in the Thursday edition of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant the following report, datelined The Hague, 18 May:

The Lords States General, wish to demonstrate to the world, and especially to the English and Scottish nation, that their High Mightinesses do not blame the current tragic, bloody and mutually ruined prosperity, navigation and commerce of the detestable war on the innocent common people, but on those who offer ill counsel, and those who, with aid of others, use the same war, to ruin the aforementioned navigation and commerce, and to overthrow the true religion and freedom of both nations ...<sup>78</sup>

This was, in essence, the text of the resolution spoken of by van der Hoolck. Dutch statesmen had come to appreciate the role of the newspaper as a channel for official communication. Knowing that the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant was widely read in England, the States General hoped by publishing these sentiments to encourage anti-Catholic and anti-French sentiments in England and fracture the Anglo-French coalition against the Dutch. Paradoxically, Dutch statesmen did not seek to use Dutch newspapers for similar persuasive strategies at home. While English politicians were to pursue partisan sponsorship of the press very actively by the first decades of the eighteenth century, the oligarchic Dutch councillors of the States General and the provincial assemblies maintained a guarded stance to the publication of domestic political news among their own citizens.

On 24 February 1670 the Court of Holland demanded that Casteleyn present himself in The Hague. It had come to the Court's attention that Casteleyn frequently reprinted extracts from confidential resolutions in his newspaper—evidently not always with permission or encouragement. Casteleyn did not travel to The Hague to answer these charges; he did not need to, since the Haarlem town council maintained that Casteleyn could only be prosecuted and tried in Haarlem, and they alone could punish him if he was guilty of a crime. In 1675 Casteleyn managed to escape prosecution again.<sup>79</sup> Abraham de Wicquefort (1606–1682), a diplomat and news agent imprisoned for espionage, testified in his trial that Casteleyn was one of the most informed men in the country.<sup>80</sup> It was alleged that Wicquefort paid Casteleyn at least 1,000 gulden a year for secret intelligence.<sup>81</sup> Again the Haarlem council defended their publisher, and Casteleyn was never arrested.

The protection offered Casteleyn by the Haarlem council was a sure sign of the prestige and status that he had accrued as the leading national news publisher. His colleagues in the local Haarlem elite appreciated this, and they were probably also not averse to thumbing their noses at Amsterdam or The Hague from time to time. Abraham's son, Gerard, who took over the publication of the newspaper in 1695, became a member of the town council in 1701.<sup>82</sup> The prestige of the Casteleyn family was typical of a wider shift in the reputation of the newspaper publisher throughout the seventeenth century. In a 1663 painting by Jan de Bray, Abraham Casteleyn presented himself and his wife Margaretha van Bancken, a notable presence in the Casteleyn business, as respected members of the bourgeois elite (see ill. 3.5). Casteleyn was a gentleman-publisher: scholarly, affluent and decorous.

By this time the princes of the newspaper trade enjoyed a very different position in the status hierarchies of the Dutch Republic from the men of the first generations: figures like the compositor and field-reporter Broer Jansz. Rather than Jansz and other progenitors of the Amsterdam press, Casteleyn emulated a newspaper publisher like the Frenchman Théophraste Renaudot, a physician and administrator who established himself at the core of the French regime in the 1630s. Casteleyn's success was to some extent mirrored by the rising social prestige of other proprietor publishers. Willem Arnold, the lawyer responsible for the Amsterdamsche Courant from 1693, was granted a more prominent spot in the Westerkerk at the weekly service several years after his appointment, sitting alongside the secretaries of the treasury.<sup>83</sup>

The changing position of the newspaperman as an officer of state came with benefits. The publisher was able to circulate in circles of power and influence, where he conversed and socialised with like-minded individuals interested in political news. The publisher could also be a person of influence in municipal government; this was very useful when it came to explaining reports in the paper that stretched the unwritten boundaries of discretion, and especially to ensure local support for the protection of his rights and monopoly.

Such protection was certainly necessary. After complaining about the derelictions of his Haarlem relatives in 1664, Casteleyn was again agitated by reproductions of his paper in 1667. On 18, 21 and 23 June Casteleyn printed at the end of his newspaper a warning to his readers: an Amsterdam printer was reissuing the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant under the pseudonym of "Pieter Symonsz", even going as far as to copy the woodcut coat of arms of the city of Haarlem at the top of the newspaper.<sup>84</sup> These reprints, according to Casteleyn, were put together with a few reports from the authentic Haarlem issues, but complemented with many "old tidings". Such reprints undoubtedly damaged Casteleyn's hard-earned reputation, and they continued to haunt him throughout his career. The Kungliga Biblioteket in Stockholm holds in its collection of Haarlem issues two anonymous reprints dated from 1675.<sup>85</sup>

Casteleyn was not the only courantier to suffer from this dubious practice. Vlacq's Haegse Post-Tydingen were reproduced as well: the National Archives in Kew hold several variant editions of his newspaper, printed with a different typeface, a variant title and the notice that it was printed "after the copy of Adriaen Vlacq".<sup>86</sup> Joannes

Naeranus, who started his Rotterdam newspaper in May 1666, was already copied two months later. An Amsterdam distributor of Naeranus, Pieter Adriaensz, notified Naeranus in July that a bookseller called Pieter Timmer was reprinting his newspaper, and selling it on the bourse: "there is one here named Pieter Timmer who has dared to reprint your Thursday newspaper on Thursday afternoon, and [which he has] distributed in abundance around the bourse, to our great detriment."<sup>87</sup> On 31 July 1666 Naeranus printed a warning against his impostor in Amsterdam at the end of his newspaper:

There is in Amsterdam an evil and ill-intentioned Geest [Ghost], who prints Rotterdamse Zee en Post-tijdingen, under the name of Pieter de Geest [the pseudonym of Timmer] at Rotterdam. This serves as warning, that here lives no Geest, but that this is a false Geest in Amsterdam, and that nobody has the consent of the honourable lords burgomasters of Rotterdam to print the Zee en Posttijdingen, except Joannes Naeranus ...<sup>88</sup>

Naeranus added that he would feature a woodcut emblem of the city of Rotterdam above his title, in order to distinguish his periodical from that of the impostor. He also petitioned the burgomasters of Rotterdam to write to their colleagues in Amsterdam, and to demand that the ghost, Pieter Timmer, be prosecuted.

This the magistrates of Rotterdam did. In an age without copyright, to deal with such imitations, which posed a real threat to both their livelihoods and reputation, the publisher had to turn to their prime customer, protector and overseer: the local government. This was another compelling reason why the established publishers were careful not to try the patience of their protectors by testing the boundaries of what was thought proper to include in their papers. Inevitably this led to a relationship that was collusive and conservative, but increasingly profitable. Dutch newspapermen made their greatest contribution to the development of the newspaper through the quality and range of their overseas correspondence network, through their adoption of advertising, and through ingenious design solutions to fit the increased quantity of news into the available space. In terms of their coverage of domestic politics they were no more daring than newsmen anywhere else in the seventeenth-century news world.

Resurgence and Struggle. The Flemish Press in the Seventeenth Century

In 1585 the Catholic world was celebrating one of its greatest feat of arms: the recovery, after years of campaigning, of the great city of Antwerp. At this time Antwerp was the most powerful commercial city of Northern Europe: the jewel in the crown of King Philip II's empire, a city of commerce, international trade and culture. It was also, it appeared, thoroughly infiltrated with Protestantism, and wholly committed to the rebel Union of Utrecht, the foundational alliance of what became the Dutch Republic. The Dutch did all they could to save Antwerp, and the urgency of the danger even induced Elizabeth I of England to commit money and troops to its defence. But this was too little, too late; the Duke of Parma's artfully planned siege held, and the city was forced to capitulate.

As Catholics rejoiced and the rebels mourned, none could have known that this would prove the zenith of Spanish military success in the Low Countries. In the years that followed Parma's troops turned to other tasks, allowing the hard-pressed rebels breathing space. The generous terms Parma had offered to secure Antwerp's surrender allowed Protestants four years to sell up and leave, and many thousands did. The population of Antwerp fell by a third, and its economy experienced a steep decline. In the years after 1585 the Dutch also turned away from Antwerp and the southern front to secure their eastern frontier, creating the two geographically compact states that we recognise today.

The Spanish or Southern Netherlands, as the residual state was known, has attracted only a fraction of the scholarly interest that has attended the meteoric rise of the Dutch Republic. In recent times a brilliant work by Luc Duerloo has chronicled the work of reconstruction undertaken by the Archdukes, Albert and Isabella, in the first two decades of the century; but with the death of Albert in 1621 the Southern Netherlands reverted rather tamely to Spanish rule; Isabella lived on, but later retreated to a convent, and retired from public life.<sup>1</sup> For the remainder of the century the Southern Netherlands was largely a pawn in great power politics; a local base for the continuation of warfare against the Dutch until 1648, and a tempting target for the vaulting ambition of Louis XIV thereafter.

The Southern Netherlands remained strategically important because it was a far from negligible prize. A compact state of 1.5 million people, largely contiguous with modern day Belgium, it remained a highly urbanised hub of commerce and quality manufacturing. While the glories of the fifteenth-century Burgundian past were now a distant memory, the Southern Netherlands retained in Ghent, Bruges, Brussels and Antwerp cities of economic and cultural importance. When the English diarist John Evelyn visited Antwerp in 1641 he thought it "one of the sweetest places in Europe. Never did I ever observe a more quiet, clean, elegantly built and civil place than this magnificent and famous city."<sup>2</sup> Until his death the year before, Antwerp had also been the home of Pieter Paul Rubens, at this point Europe's most famous and prolific artist. His presence made Antwerp the indispensable centre of the European art market, a magnet to any serious collector.

It was inevitable that such a place would have a vibrant news culture. Brussels was the northern capital of the Habsburg Empire, and together with Antwerp an established nodal point on the European postal network. From here manuscript newsletters and other sources of intelligence could be sent north to Amsterdam, west to London, east to Cologne, or south to Paris.<sup>3</sup> Antwerp also remained a major centre of European print culture, sustained in no small measure by the work of Catholic renewal undertaken by the Archdukes. It was certain that such a place would play a lively role in the new newspaper trade. What was less predictable was that it would spawn, from early in the century, one of the most innovative and unusual new serials attempted anywhere in Europe.

Abraham Verhoeven, Courantier Extraordinaire

Like his contemporary (and bitter adversary) Broer Jansz (1579–1652), Abraham Verhoeven (1575–1652) brought to the newspaper age a wealth of experience as a publisher and a newsman.<sup>4</sup> Verhoeven was born into the printing industry; his father was a cutter of prints, and like so many from this generation worked for several years in the great industrial enterprise of Christophe Plantin. Abraham himself first appears as an independent publisher in 1605, when he offered for sale a topical newsprint, a broadsheet account of the battle of Ekeren, a significant victory for Habsburg forces over the marauding Dutch, complete with an engraved illustration. This and other topographical prints announced him as a major new talent in the news trade.<sup>5</sup> A privilege of 1605 protecting his prints and engravings from unauthorised copying was the first sign of the official approbation that would attend him for much of his career.<sup>6</sup>

Verhoeven seems to have met the not inconsiderable costs of establishing a workshop specialising in woodcuts and engravings through an advantageous marriage, to the daughter of Antoon Spierinx, a manufacturer of playing cards. In later years this marriage would collapse in acrimony, and introduce considerable turbulence into Verhoeven's life, but for a decade or more the young couple built a substantial position in the Antwerp book industry. By 1617 Verhoeven had begun to specialise more systematically in the publication of news pamphlets, leading in 1620 to the decisive development that presaged the establishment of his newspaper, the Nieuwe Tijdinghen, as it would become known: the grant of a privilege providing him the exclusive right to publish

All the victories, sieges, captures and castles accomplished by his Imperial Majesty in Germany, Bohemia, Moravia, Austria, Silesia, Hungary and other

Imperial provinces, exploited by [Generals] Bucquoy and Dampier, or others, as well as all new tidings from Holland, Brabant, and other provinces above the Meuse.<sup>7</sup>

This striking description of purpose set Verhoeven on a track that would deviate substantially from any other recognised news vehicle in the seventeenth century news world.

By the time Verhoeven received the privilege for his new venture there were already several models of periodical news on which he could draw. The 1605 weekly Strasbourg Relation had been joined by half a dozen in other German towns.<sup>8</sup> Then there were the two sober Amsterdam papers, with their austere and economical double-sided single sheets. Verhoeven chose a different path. First he opted for the German pamphlet form. In this way the news pamphlets he had published with increasing regularity since 1617 could morph almost insensibly into a serial, first with continuous signatures ("A", "B", "C", etc.), a signal to the buyer that they should be bound together at the end of the year.

From 1621 the issues would also be continuously numbered. This was the most significant demonstration that Verhoeven thought of his venture as a serial. For Verhoeven did not give his issues a uniform title, nor did he aspire to strict periodicity. There was no particular day of the week on which subscribers could expect to receive one of Verhoeven's news pamphlets. Rather they came as the news dictated, sometimes with an interval of five days, sometimes in a great flurry, four in a week or even two or three on the same day. This, too, was a major innovation, for at this point no other publisher had attempted more than a weekly service. To do more, in an age when most newspapers were assembled by the publisher working alone, would have been impossibly demanding. By ignoring these precepts Verhoeven took a great risk, and gambled on his own intellectual resources and stamina; for this was a time in which news came in astonishing abundance, much of it news from the military front. Happily for Verhoeven, in these years it was also almost exclusively news that his Antwerp clientele could celebrate.

In this regard, too, Verhoeven took full advantage of the freedoms granted by the decision to avoid a uniform title. Whereas the German newspapers used the title-page for a largely standard presentation of the title with a uniform emblematic illustration, Verhoeven drew on the sixteenth-century tradition of the sensational news pamphlet. The title offered, with partisan flee, a full description of the most significant news offered:

March 1621. 50. Account of the great victory and battle which Count Bucquoy gained with the Cossacks against the Hungarians.<sup>9</sup>

April 1621. 51. Portrayal of Calvinist cruelty along the river Rhine between Bacharach and Coub.<sup>10</sup>

May 1621. 77. New tidings from Prague, including the names of all the escaped rebels, whose names have been nailed on the gallows in Prague.<sup>11</sup>

These titles gave the Nieuwe Tijdinghen a double appeal. While the regular subscriber would be encouraged to plunge straight into the text by these cheerful tidings, the eye-catching headlines also encouraged occasional purchasers to pick up a copy from a bookshop or street stall—as they would have been accustomed to with any other news pamphlet. That this strategy was successful is evident from the frequent survival of issues that had to be reprinted during the course of the week. Verhoeven may well have kept the type standing in the frame until he had had a chance to gauge market reaction. Many of the reprints are identical but for the change of date.<sup>12</sup>

Verhoeven also drew on the pamphlet tradition with the addition of an illustration to the title-page (see ill. 4.1). Again, this did not follow the German prototype, with their repeated use of the same single woodcut (a flying Mercury, the local coat of arms or a typographical vignette), but offered instead a vivid miscellany of striking images: a ship or a fleet, two bands of cavalry thundering together, troops entering a fortified town, portraits of generals, executions, or a threatening Ottoman sultan. Verhoeven, with his early experience of illustrated broadsheets, seems to have executed these woodcuts himself, though many of them are crude enough to suggest the time constraints under which his workshop operated.

With the passage of time, the woodcuts, frequently reused, became rather worn, and Verhoeven did little to replenish his stock after the most creative years of the early 1620s. Sometimes, too, the choice of illustration seemed rather unconnected with the headline, or indeed the contents. But in 1620 it was a striking departure in the newspaper world, a news medium that had consciously presented itself as the heir to the staid, sober tradition of the manuscript avvisi. In 1621 Verhoeven seemed to be turning this tradition on its head, with a riotous celebration of the revival of Catholic arms in the Holy Roman Empire and the Low Countries.

The time was opportune, for in 1621 Habsburg armies appeared to be heading for a victory so decisive that it might permanently re-shape the European balance of power. When Frederick V of the Palatinate had accepted the crown of Bohemia in 1618 it seemed that the Habsburg grip on the Imperial crown had been weakened beyond recovery. Three years later Frederick was a pitiful refugee in Holland, Bohemia was subdued and the lands of the Palatinate along the Rhine, a strategic territory of enormous symbolic importance to the international Protestant cause, had been invested by Catholic troops and confiscated. There was much to celebrate, and Verhoeven was happy to lead the applause.

By 1621 the Nieuwe Tijdinghen had hit its stride; Verhoeven published 196 issues this year, and 183 the next. This was in many ways a triumph for marketing; once the reader moved beyond the arresting title-pages of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen the content was often surprisingly conventional. Verhoeven is rightly celebrated for his design and thematic innovation, not least in the variety of approaches he brought to filling the pages of successive issues. Sometimes he would abandon the normal newspaper format altogether, and devote the whole issue to a single despatch from the battlefield, or two poems ridiculing the unfortunate Frederick of the Palatinate or another adversary of the Habsburg cause. The majority of the issues were more conventional, however, containing a sequence of datelined reports in a manner familiar from German and Dutch newspapers of the same period. Verhoeven would normally offer between three and six reports in each issue, which meant that a subscriber would get about the same amount of news in two or three issues a week as a subscriber to an Amsterdam newspaper; and vastly more entertainment along the way.

Verhoeven, it was clear, was making up the rules as he went along. Publishing an authorised enterprise in a city like Antwerp he had access to many sources of news, and significant additional help. Among those who wrote copy for him were the well-known English Catholic author

The initials of the designated censor, normally a Canon of Antwerp Cathedral or other senior local churchman, are found at the end of most issues.<sup>14</sup>

During its glory days Verhoeven's Nieuwe Tijdinghen had a huge following; that much is evident both from the frequent need for reprints and from reactions to Verhoeven's effusions elsewhere in Europe. But it is also clear that even in the Southern Netherlands not everyone appreciated

Verhoeven's particular approach to the news publisher's art. His fall from grace in the later 1620s was precipitate; and even during the glory days of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen there was at least one attempt to set up a rival newspaper with a very different, and more conventional, approach to serial news. We know of this early rival only from a very recent and rather extraordinary find: a series of issues from what was evidently a news serial published, not in Antwerp, but in Brussels, capital of the Southern Netherlandish Habsburg state.

Until very recently the existence of a serial press in Brussels during the first generation of newspaper publishing was unknown—to this point the first previously documented Brussels newspaper had been the Relations véritables of 1649.<sup>15</sup> This all changed with the unexpected appearance of eight issues of a Brussels news serial concealed among the pamphlet volumes of the Fagel collection in Trinity College, Dublin.<sup>16</sup> The Fagels were some of the most prominent public servants of the Dutch state in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; Gaspar Fagel, whose working papers make up a large part of these volumes, was the successor of Jan de Witt as Pensionary of Holland. Among the many riches of the Fagel collection is a massive sequence of some 243 bound volumes of pamphlets—these constitute the biggest and certainly most coherent collection of such material outside the Low Countries. Curiously, they contain very few newspapers; presumably the family's Dutch newspapers were stored separately and later sold on or disposed of. The copies of the Brussels paper have survived because they were published, like Verhoeven's Nieuwe Tijdinghen, in pamphlet form, and simply stored with the other pamphlets in the collection.

These eight issues were all published in the spring and summer of 1621, shortly after Verhoeven had begun the Nieuwe Tijdinghen. Like many early papers, the Brussels venture had no common title on the top of the first page; but the oldest two use the striking title Nouvelles Neutrelles. This title seems to have been carefully chosen to distance the venture from Verhoeven's more rumbustious style, because the Brussels paper adopts an entirely more traditional format: a series of reports, dated from Europe's most prominent news centres, in the traditional avvisi style. The publisher, Huybrecht (I) Anthoon, chose not to identify himself on his paper. But he was a significant figure in the Brussels print trade, and held the privilege of publishing ordinances and other official announcements for the Habsburg government. All of this suggests that the Nouvelles Neutrelles was published with the full support of the Brussels authorities as a deliberate counter-weight to Verhoeven's serial; it would have catered largely to the Francophone elite of the southern capital.

This is a very significant find. If we leave aside the Courant d'Italie et d'Almaigne, a translated version of the Courante uyt Italien published by Caspar van Hilten by at least 1620, the Nouvelles Neutrelles is the oldest French-language newspaper published anywhere in Europe, preceding the Paris Gazette by ten years. Its rediscovery also reminds us that there was always a very significant domestic audience for French-language news in the Southern Netherlands. A far higher proportion of the extant newspapers from the south, admittedly still a smaller market than that which flourished in the Dutch Republic, were published in French, in Antwerp and in Brussels. These catered not only to the French-speaking populations of the Walloon provinces, but to the Francophone elite of the Southern nobility and bourgeoisie. This comprised a large part of the potential newspaper-buying population, and in consequence left far less room for a Flemish newspaper, in Brussels at least. As we shall see, the first Brussels paper published in Flemish did not appear until 1673; and then it lasted only two years.

Two Fat Dutch Lies

Verhoeven maintained the Nieuwe Tijdinghen for the best part of a decade, a total of 1,346 issues. It was a remarkable achievement, and one does not have to accept the overblown claims for Verhoeven as the proprietor of Europe's first newspaper (still proudly proclaimed on the Antwerp building that housed his press) to recognise this. Verhoeven's paper came at an important moment for the Southern Netherlandish state. The last quarter of the sixteenth century had been a disastrous period for the southern provinces. The dogged campaigning that eventually restored Flanders and Brabant to Spanish control had a seriously adverse impact on the economy, exacerbated by the flight of Protestants north after the surrender of Ghent, Brussels and Antwerp to the armies of the Duke of Parma. With the Dutch commanding the estuary of the river Scheldt, blocking Antwerp's route to the sea, the city was effectively cut off from the international trade that had underpinned what was fondly remembered as Antwerp's Golden Age.

Now, two decades into the new century, those who had remained in the shattered and depopulated southern cities could at last see some cause for optimism. A stabilisation of the urban economies brought the prospect of future prosperity. Just as important, the acute and sympathetic rule of the Archdukes offered a rallying point for a renewed sense of national identity, encouraged by some significant victories over the marauding Dutch—one of these, at Ekeren, had allowed Verhoeven to get his first experience of the news world. Turning back the Dutch allowed some stabilisation of the frontier, and broke the seemingly endless series of reverses at the hands of the new northern state. Now, with the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, a sequence of spectacular Catholic victories promised a significant shift in the balance of forces between Catholics and Protestants. Verhoeven's exuberant, teasing texts caught this new mood perfectly, and this was no doubt a major element in their success. He delighted in trumpeting not only Catholic victories, but the attendant turbulence in Dutch politics. The Remonstrant controversies, with the execution of Oldenbarnevelt and the subsequent expulsion of many Remonstrant ministers, was a favourite topic, and occupied many issues of the Antwerp paper.

Verhoeven was also not afraid to take the fight directly to his northern competitors, Broer Jansz and Jan van Hilten. In 1626 Verhoeven dedicated the second issue of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen to a word-for-word rebuttal of one of the issues of Van Hilten's Courante uyt Italien, published on 6 December 1625 (see ill. 4.2).<sup>17</sup> Verhoeven countered Van Hilten's reports on developments in Savoy, Hungary, England, Denmark and the Holy Roman Empire. In the same year Verhoeven ridiculed Broer Jansz for printing false news of the victory of the King of Denmark against the Imperial army.<sup>18</sup> Two years later Verhoeven offered to his readers "Dutch lies from Amsterdam, arrived via Cologne"; issue 123 of the same year was entitled New Tidings from Vienna in Austria. With another two fat lies from Holland.<sup>19</sup>

These exchanges probably did little to damage the reputations of the contesting newspapers with their own readers; this was, after all, criticism from behind enemy lines. But they do show that both the Amsterdam and Antwerp publishers proceeded on the assumption that their papers would be read on the other side of the border, and there is plentiful evidence that this was indeed the case. Dutch newspaper publishers were well-known figures in the south: Broer Jansz and his son Joost Broersz were mocked in anonymous southern pamphlets in the 1630s, while Carolus Scribani's 1627 Le Remonstrant des Hollandois, which offered a political strategy for the subjugation of the northern rebels, claimed sarcastically to have been printed by "Joris Veseler [former printer of Van Hilten's Courante] and Broer Jansz".<sup>20</sup> But Dutch newspapers were not read exclusively for entertainment in the Southern Netherlands. The Bruges courantier Nicolaes Breyghel reprinted and cited reports from Amsterdam newspapers in his Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheyde ghewesten, while the magistrates of Bruges read a variety of Dutch newspapers.<sup>21</sup> The magistrates of Ghent paid 43 gulden a year for newspapers published in Brussels, Antwerp, Haarlem and Amsterdam in the later seventeenth and early eighteenth century.<sup>22</sup> The Antwerp city council resolved on 19 May 1679 to ban the sale of the Leiden Traduction libre des gazettes Flamandes et autres in their city.<sup>23</sup> By the early eighteenth century, newspapers printed in Haarlem and The Hague had subscribers in various Flemish towns, including Brussels, Sint-Niklaas, Louvain, Ostend, Ypres, Tournai, Bruges, Ghent, Mechelen and Antwerp.<sup>24</sup>

This was, in any case, a highly porous border. Many of the inhabitants of the new Dutch state were transplanted from the south, including, of course, many of the new state's leading printers. These new residents left behind a complex network of friends and kin. These family connections continued to be cherished and helped sustain fairly easy movement between the two states; especially when we consider that with the exception of the years of the Twelve Years' Truce (1609–1621) the two states were continuously at war until 1648. Each summer would bring a new campaigning season, and troops would go on manoeuvres, or settle into patient sieges on the north Brabant plain. But it was clear that a dense complex of relationships could not be unravelled by a state of war which, in any case, became increasingly desultory as the tide of Catholic success ebbed in the 1630s. Antwerp, despite its economic tribulation, remained a major centre of book production, and books from the south were sold quite openly on the Amsterdam market. The southern cities remained a major source of news for the northern papers, and vice versa.

Towards the end of his career an ageing and sickly Abraham Verhoeven would turn to the north for inspiration. Verhoeven had lost his exclusive privilege of news publication in 1629, and the Nieuwe Tijdinghen had come to an unexpected end. Despite worsening fortunes for the Habsburg cause in the later 1620s, Verhoeven's productivity had not yet been dented: in 1627 and 1628 he still published over 140 issues each year. Verhoeven restarted his business with the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe in 1629, an unillustrated, sober imitation of his Nieuwe Tijdinghen.<sup>25</sup> This too failed by the end of 1631, and by 1632 Verhoeven launched his last periodical venture, the Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c. In a striking departure from previous form, Verhoeven's Courante imitated the title, format and style of the weekly Amsterdam newspapers so ridiculed by the Antwerp newsman in the 1620s. By this point Verhoeven was fifty-seven years old: he was exhausted, in poor health and pursued by debtors. The publication of the Courante was in many ways a white flag, a final attempt to resuscitate Verhoeven's floundering business by copying the format of the popular Amsterdam weeklies. But Verhoeven never quite managed to do so: the surviving issues of his Courante contain barely half the quantity of news offered by his northern rivals. For the next two years Verhoeven struggled on, but it is clear that the Courante did not revive his fortunes. In the autumn of 1634 he sold his newspaper and his business to his son, Isaac (1607–1637), on the condition that he was allowed to work in his son's shop for a daily wage.

It is uncertain for how long Isaac Verhoeven, who died at the start of 1637, continued to publish the Courante.<sup>26</sup> It is possible that Isaac too abandoned the venture, because in 1635 two new printers would start newspapers in Antwerp. In the tight-knit community of booksellers and printers in Antwerp, the demise of Verhoeven and his news licence will have been closely watched. The two new courantiers, Willem Verdussen (1592–1667) and Martin Binnart (c. 1590–1652/1653), saw a chance and quickly occupied the vacuum left by the final eclipse of Verhoeven's business.<sup>27</sup> Both men petitioned the Council of Brabant for a licence to print a newspaper, and by the summer of 1635 Verdussen had begun the Extraordinarissen Post-tijdinghe and Binnart was publishing Den Ordinarissen Postilioen. The two courantiërs strove to publish their newspapers on a bi-weekly schedule, usually publishing on Tuesdays and Fridays, but this was not strictly observed. In this flexibility of publication the Antwerp newsmen followed in the footsteps of Verhoeven; otherwise they looked for inspiration to the Dutch Republic. In his petition, Verdussen mentioned that he wished to publish his newspaper in the “new manner”, that is, the half-sheet folio format of the Dutch.<sup>28</sup> The two newspapers appeared in the same style as the sober Dutch double-sided sheets, a decisive departure from the standard pamphlet format used to this point in the Southern Netherlands, and elsewhere in Europe.

From at least 1637 the Antwerp courantiërs were joined by Nicolaes Breyghel (?–1669), who had started his weekly Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten in Bruges, one of the main cities of Flanders and the commercial entrepôt of the Flemish coast.<sup>29</sup> Breyghel too modelled his newspaper on the Dutch style, even drawing inspiration for his title from Broer Jansz’s Tijdinghen uyt verscheide Quartieren. While the Antwerp and Bruges papers of the 1630s and 1640s may have imitated the Dutch style, they were in several respects inferior. The Amsterdam courantiërs filled their newspapers with around 2,000 words per issue, but the Antwerp papers usually contained between 1,200 and 1,400 words each. The news reports were often separated by large chunks of white space; the inking was generally poor; and Binnart and Breyghel especially maintained limited networks of correspondents.

This lower quality was not due to technical incompetence. Neither was it the result of a lack of demand for serial news: the fact that Verdussen, Binnart and Breyghel entered the trade so shortly after Verhoeven’s disappearance suggests as much. Yet the southern courantiërs faced a far more daunting task than their northern counterparts in supplying the news to their readers. In 1635 France declared war on the Spanish and Austrian Habsburgs, and allied with the Dutch Republic, effectively entering the conflict (to much Catholic disapproval) on the Protestant side. The Franco-Dutch onslaught on the Southern Netherlands had two serious repercussions for any newsman in the state. The first was the disruption of paper supplies. Until the second half of the seventeenth century there were no paper mills in the Southern Netherlands; all paper was imported from France, the Holy Roman Empire or the Dutch Republic. As French troops advanced into the Southern Netherlands and the Rhineland, paper could be hard to come by in Bruges or Antwerp. The lack of a strict schedule of publication was most likely influenced by the fluctuating paper supply.

The Flemish courantiërs were further restricted by the general deterioration in Habsburg fortunes. Abraham Verhoeven’s Nieuwe Tijdinghen had in part been a success because it documented with such glee the divisions and defeats of the Dutch and German Protestants in the early 1620s. Verhoeven was able to build a brand which pleased the authorities and entertained readers. Verdussen, Binnart and Breyghel were attempting to establish their newspapers in very different times. The newsmen could celebrate a few Habsburg victories in the 1630s, most notably at Louvain (1635), Kallo (1637), Saint-Omer (1638) and Thionville (1639), but by the 1640s Habsburg possessions were under threat throughout Europe. Revolts in Portugal, Naples, Catalonia, and warfare in the Americas, Italy, the Holy Roman Empire and the Low Countries overwhelmed Habsburg resources. With news of defeats arriving from all major news theatres, delicate editorial decisions were required from the Flemish courantiërs if they were to keep their readers informed while signalling their continuing allegiance to the Habsburg cause.

That this was a complicated task was most evident during the disastrous battle of the Downs in the autumn of 1639.<sup>30</sup> A Spanish armada was despatched to the Southern Netherlands in the summer of 1639 to lift the Dutch coastal blockade and engage the Dutch fleet, but after a drawn-out skirmish the main body of the Spanish armada became trapped in the shoals of the Downs off Kent. After a month-long blockade the Dutch fleet, bolstered by reinforcements, destroyed or captured the majority of the armada. Many Habsburg defeats took place in distant lands, and could be gently ignored or obscured; but the blockade and battle of the Downs took place in full view of the Southern Netherlands. Hundreds of sailors and soldiers from the defeated fleet landed at Dunkirk and other Flemish ports, and the remnants of the armada would straggle into port in various states of dishevelment in early November. News of the disaster spread rapidly; rumours of the scale of defeat, fuelled by Dutch and French sources, encouraged panic. The surviving issues of Verdussen and Binnart's papers suggests that the newsmen ignored the blockade and battle altogether, printing not a word on the dire situation. Well after the engagement, they tried to minimise Habsburg losses and denounce triumphant Dutch exaggerations, all the while shifting the news focus to the ongoing successes of the Dunkirk privateers. This was probably the best the Flemish courantiers could do, but it was not enough. Sales were undoubtedly low that autumn; few readers like to buy a newspaper—a relative indulgence—to be reminded of a dreadful disaster.

Editorial licence was restricted by the continued presence of preventative censorship. Every issue of the Bruges and Antwerp papers had to be approved by ecclesiastical censors before publication. This was a common feature of the Southern Netherlandish book trade, but it posed a more significant problem for the news trade. A book was only required to be submitted to the censors once, and if approved could then be published. A delay in securing approval was irritating, but hardly terminal. A bi-weekly newspaper had to be approved a hundred times a year, and publication was time-sensitive. This caused inevitable difficulties if the designated official was out of town, indisposed or simply too busy. It also exacerbated the tendency to cautious self-censorship, since the exigencies of bi-weekly publication hardly allowed time for re-submission if the first version was refused. Dutch commentators made much of the effects of preventative censorship of this sort. Marcus Zuerius van Boxhorn, professor of rhetoric at Leiden, derided Nicolaes Breyghel in a 1647 pamphlet for publishing a superstitious report on the miraculous powers of the Virgin Mary.<sup>31</sup> Towards the end of his attack Van Boxhorn sighed that “this newspaper is censored, that is, permitted to be printed only because there is nothing in there which contradicts the Holy Roman Catholic faith. Unbelievable!”<sup>32</sup> A Dutch pamphlet published after the battle of the Downs attacked Willem Verdussen in Antwerp for ignoring the battle, and then fabricating false reports to present the aftermath of the catastrophe in a more favourable light.<sup>33</sup> In a satirical inversion, the smug Dutch pamphleteer singled out the ecclesiastical censor as the solution to Verdussen's problems:

And please greet the censor of your letters and newspapers, and tell him that next time he should pay a little more attention, and not let such crude lies pass by his sight; so we can't make fun of you anymore.<sup>34</sup>

The Dutch were especially self-righteous because they had largely abandoned preventative censorship in the later sixteenth century. Dutch courantiers experienced no inspection prior to publication, and were left to their own devices to judge what material was too delicate to be included in their newspapers. If they got this wrong, of course, they would be liable to punitive action. This was not an infrequent occurrence in the Dutch Republic, where newspapermen were under competitive pressure to demonstrate their access to the best sources of information, and sometimes strayed into territory that brought down upon their heads the wrath of the local magistrates. In consequence there were far more cases of newspapermen being fined or suspended in the Dutch Republic than the Southern Netherlands, though these punishments were often of short duration, and sometimes not enforced.<sup>35</sup> Though this unwritten and sometimes rather arbitrary code of conduct was sometimes difficult to interpret, on balance it does seem that the lack of preventative censorship offered the Amsterdam rivals of Verdussen and Binnart more room for manoeuvre. When Broer Jansz and Jan van Hilten reported on the Dutch defeat at Kallo the year before the battle of the Downs, they included lengthy, and reasonably accurate, accounts of Dutch losses. Reporting defeat was complicated, but the manner in which newsmen dealt with it affected their credibility and reputation. The preventative censorship experienced by the Flemish courantiers tied their reputation to that of the state; and it suffered along with the declining fortunes of the Spanish Habsburgs in the 1630s and 1640s.

In 1648, a downcast Martin Binnart petitioned the Council of Brabant for a subsidy. The sales of Binnart's papers were down: fewer people, he admitted, bought his newspapers because he had fewer Habsburg victories to report.<sup>36</sup> Binnart, originally from Eisenach in Saxony, had always focused predominantly on Habsburg achievements in the Holy Roman Empire, and he often relied on contacts in Saxony for news of German events. He feared that his business would flounder now that peace in the Empire was restored and the conflict with the Dutch had come to an end. But Binnart was too pessimistic. War would continue elsewhere to satisfy the curiosities of his customers: the Franco-Spanish war would last until 1659; war between Spain and England would erupt in 1654; and new conflicts arose in the Baltic as Sweden turned her attention elsewhere. At the same time connections between the Southern Netherlands and the Dutch Republic and the Holy Roman Empire were restored and strengthened. Disruptions to news networks and paper supplies diminished. In Antwerp the publication of the Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe and Den Ordinarissen Postilioen became more regular. When Willem Verdussen and Martin Binnart died their ventures were continued by their heirs, and Antwerp would have a competitive local press until the end of the 1670s.

Civic Loyalties

In the autumn of 1666 the Ghent printer Maximiliaen Graet petitioned the Habsburg Privy Council in Brussels for the right to publish a newspaper. Graet, stadsdrukker in Ghent, stated in his petition that he had been encouraged by “notable merchants and other persons” in the city, who wished to enjoy the benefits of a local newspaper.<sup>37</sup> This was a common argument used by various would-be courantiërs in the Low Countries. Willem Verdussen and Martin Binnart had used similar reasoning in their petitions thirty years earlier, and so did Joannes Naeranus in Rotterdam in 1666.<sup>38</sup> A local newspaper was a public service as much as a private commercial venture. The political and commercial news offered in the weekly issues of the paper could be of significant value for the local merchant community, and this was not a negligible part of the paper’s appeal. But there was also clearly by this point a sense that a newspaper was a proper accoutrement of a sophisticated city, and Ghent was certainly this.

This was a notable shift in purpose and rationale from Abraham Verhoeven’s Nieuwe Tijdinghen. Verhoeven had published a newspaper which prided itself first and foremost on being a supporter of the international Habsburg cause: he was deeply concerned about the reputation of the Catholic faith and the Habsburg dynasty. Removed from Brussels, the epicentre of Habsburg power in the Low Countries, the Nieuwe Tijdinghen never became a government-run paper like the Paris Gazette or the London Gazette; but the Nieuwe Tijdinghen’s appeal was not restricted to Antwerp. Verhoeven, with his exclusive monopoly on printed news, had aspired to a national Flemish market.

In the 1660s, Verhoeven’s successors had no such ambitions.<sup>39</sup> Rather, they prided themselves on their role as representatives of their urban community. In his 1666 petition, Graet reminded the Privy Council that newspapers were already published in Antwerp, Bruges and (since 1649) Brussels. Graet argued that it would be an injustice if Ghent, the third city of the Southern Netherlands and the capital of Flanders, were to be denied a local press.

Graet was granted his position as courantiër in Ghent, and his Ghendtsche Post-Tydinghen appeared every Monday and Thursday from the start of 1667. That the new paper was appreciated by the local community is evident firstly from the fact that the position of newspaper publisher was hotly contested. The Council of Flanders fined Baudouin (II) Manilius in September 1667 for infringing on Graet’s privilege.<sup>40</sup> When Maximiliaen Graet died in 1676, and his widow, Jacoba de Somere, sought to renew the licence, she was faced by a challenge from Michiel Maes, another Ghent printer.<sup>41</sup> To defend her claim to maintain her husband’s local privilege, De Somere attached to her petition a letter from fifteen Ghent merchants, who stated that

The Weekly Post-tidings or Gazettes that the widow of the late Mr Maximilian Graet has published since the death of her aforesaid husband, are as good in their style, and as curious in content, as those that the aforesaid Graet published during his lifetime. We know this because we have read both the one and the other.<sup>42</sup>

In 1682, when De Somere died, the succession of the Ghendtsche Post-Tydinghen was contested once more, this time by Jean de Dryvere.<sup>43</sup> The courantiërs in Antwerp were locked in a similar struggle. By the second half of the seventeenth century it became clear that the Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe of the Verdussens was of better quality than Den Ordinarissen Postilioen of the Binnarts. In 1654 Willem Verdussen’s licence as courantiër was renewed indefinitely, while Maria Strang, the widow of Martin Binnart, only received a renewal of ten years. In 1674 Peter Verdussen, Willem's successor, appealed for the termination of the rival paper; this was rejected on the grounds that the licence of the Binnarts still had four years validity. When this period ran out all trace of Den Ordinariissen Postilioen disappears—in all likelihood the Verdussens were successful in their aggressive attempts to monopolise the Antwerp news trade.

For a short period of time Bruges was the most competitive news centre of the seventeenth-century Southern Netherlands. Nicolaes Breyghel had published his Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheyde ghewesten until at least 1660. When he ceased publication he was replaced by three competing courantiërs, each publishing a weekly newspaper.<sup>44</sup> By the mid-1660s Alexander Michiels (?–1677), a former apprentice of Breyghel, published a newspaper on Friday; the widow of Joannes Clouwet (?–1686) published on Tuesday; and Lucas vande Kerchove (1618–1675) published on Wednesday. It is uncertain exactly when these three publishers had all begun to publish their papers, but we do know that by the summer of 1666 the magistrates of Bruges were no longer prepared to tolerate the situation.<sup>45</sup> The magistrates believed that the presence of three competing papers was driving down standards. They ordered the three courantiërs to bid for the exclusive right to publish a newspaper; this would reduce the quantity of issues and allow the remaining courantiër to invest in a better news network. The three courantiërs made a counter-offer to the magistrates: they would apply for the monopoly as a consortium, and the three publishers would alternate publication. From 27 July onwards, each of the courantiërs published a bi-weekly newspaper every third week.

It is easy to think of the magistrates of Bruges as a repressive force, eager to reduce the availability of political information. But their concerns were rooted in a conviction that the presence of a local newspaper was a service to the urban community and a proud reflection of its importance; therefore the quality of the local press called for close attention. That the magistrates valued their local press in this way is especially clear from the repeated tussles concerning the publication of newspapers between the magistrates of Bruges, Antwerp and Ghent, and the central authorities in Brussels.<sup>46</sup> This struggle stemmed from the emergence in 1649 of a bi-weekly paper in Brussels with close connections to the Privy Council. In that year the French lawyer Pierre Hugonet published the first issue of the bi-weekly Relations véritables, a French newspaper modelled on the style of the Paris Gazette. Hugonet marketed his newspaper to the Privy Council as a Habsburg variant of the Parisian Gazette: a newspaper sponsored by the state, and one which could always be relied upon to defend the reputation of the government and glorify its achievements. In order to prove his worth, Hugonet immediately launched himself and his paper into a running battle with Théophraste Renaudot, the publisher of the Parisian Gazette. Every week the Relations véritables would feature a denunciation of reports published in the Gazette, accusing Renaudot of fabricating victories and ignoring French defeats.

In France, the Gazette had enjoyed a monopoly of publication since 1631.<sup>47</sup> In order to defend this privilege from competitors distant from the capital, Renaudot leased out the right to reprint the Gazette to booksellers in various provincial towns. In consequence a single bi-weekly newspaper, and a single editorial voice, catered to twenty million citizens. Hugonet may have aspired to a similar position in the Southern Netherlands; he was, in some ways, the true successor of Abraham Verhoeven. But Verhoeven, unlike Renaudot, had never enjoyed financial subsidies from the government, and the Privy Council never provided him with the same measure of protection as was afforded to Renaudot in France. And Hugonet, despite his hopes of emulating Renaudot, would also eventually fall short. In 1655 he was granted at least a theoretical monopoly of newspaper publication in the Southern Netherlands, but he did not receive the more tangible proof of official favour in the form of a state pension.<sup>48</sup> His monopoly also had little practical value. The Privy Council did not take action to suppress any of the Flemish newspapers published in Antwerp or Bruges. The monopoly did not even obstruct new publishers, such as the three Bruges courantiërs, from entering the newspaper trade. In fact, it seems that the Privy Council deliberately ignored Hugonet's privilege. When Maximiliaen Graet petitioned for a licence to publish his Ghendtsche Post-Tydinghen in 1666, the Privy Council in Brussels could have easily denied him this right on the grounds of Hugonet's monopoly. However, in order to avoid a direct confrontation over the issue, the councillors forwarded the petition to the Council of Flanders, which, in its turn, asked the magistrates of Ghent for their opinion on the matter.<sup>49</sup> After receiving a favourable response, the Council of Flanders issued Graet with his licence.

In 1667 a disillusioned Hugonet sold his newspaper to Dr Adrien Foppens (1631–1695), a lawyer from a Frisian Catholic family living in exile in Brussels. Foppens was a more successful courantier than Hugonet—he quickly managed to extract an annual pension from the Privy Council. In the early 1670s Foppens would do his best to realise the full potential of his exclusive monopoly, but he too would be defeated by the political decentralisation of the Southern Netherlands and the civic pride of its urban magistrates. In 1672 Foppens submitted a petition to the Privy Council, drawing their attention to the numerous papers published in the Southern Netherlands.<sup>50</sup> He urged his superiors to prohibit the publication of all newspapers in Antwerp, Bruges and Ghent. The councillors wrote to the magistrates of the three cities to inquire who published newspapers in their cities, and on what legal basis they did so. The responses were staunch. The magistrates of all three cities stated that their courantiers had every right to publish their newspapers: Peter Verdussen and Maria Strang had licences from the Council of Brabant, Maximiliaen Graet had a licence from the Council of Flanders, and the Bruges courantiers, so their magistrates emphasised, had gained the customary right of publication as a consortium since 1666.<sup>51</sup> Furthermore, the magistrates of Ghent argued that it would be unjust to prohibit their local paper, which cost only a stuiver, when the only alternative was Foppens' Relations véritables, which cost three times as much, and was published in French, a language which most citizens of Ghent could not read.<sup>52</sup>

After these defiant replies, Foppens took a variety of measures. In 1673 he started, on the Privy Council's urging, a bi-weekly Flemish newspaper, the Waerachtigh Verhael, to provide a paper for Flemish readers throughout the Southern Netherlands.<sup>53</sup> Foppens continued to press the Privy Council to prohibit the newspapers in Antwerp, Bruges and Ghent, and he included a statement in the imprint of the Waerachtigh Verhael which threatened his rival courantiers with a fine of thirty gulden. Foppens also tried to enforce his monopoly by inducing his rivals to sell his Brussels newspaper instead of publishing their own. In a report to the governor-general in 1673 Foppens stated that he had promised to deliver the Waerachtigh Verhael exclusively to the publishers in Antwerp and Ghent for the sum of two stuivers.<sup>54</sup> The courantiers in Bruges received an even better offer: Foppens promised them every issue of his newspaper for only one stuiver. Given that the postal rate from Brussels to Bruges was three stuivers, Foppens would have been making a substantial loss on this deal.<sup>55</sup>

To the newsmen in Antwerp, Bruges and Ghent these were financially tempting contracts. They could still make a profit through the sale of Foppens' paper, without making significant investments in a network of correspondents. Yet none of the courantiers accepted the offer: they valued their independence and their prominent position in the urban community above a quick profit. Moreover, they were not assured of similar sales figures by selling the Waerachtigh Verhael: the Brussels paper, whilst cheaper than its French variant, was still double the price of the Antwerp, Bruges and Ghent newspapers.

Foppens threw in the towel in 1674, after a final effort to realise his monopoly. He had written to the King of Spain, demanding that all other newspapers be prohibited now that he published a Flemish newspaper.<sup>56</sup> He included with the correspondence a copy of the Ghendtsche Post-Tydinghen which described Swedish military preparations against the Habsburg in incautiously complimentary terms. This, Foppens claimed, was the "sort of writing [which] causes unrest amongst the people, and discourages them."<sup>57</sup> The Privy Council wrote once more to the magistrates of the three newspaper cities. The magistrates of Antwerp did not respond, and those of Bruges and Ghent remained obstinate. The councillors in Brussels did not pursue the matter further. They knew that Habsburg government, despite its autocratic and centralising tendencies, could not rule without consent and support from the major cities of the region. Foppens ceased publication of the Waerachtigh Verhael and concentrated on his French newspaper for the rest of the seventeenth century.

The Brussels authorities were not unmindful of their duty to respect and defend the privileges that they had awarded to their appointed courantier. Nevertheless, it is striking that, faced by an obdurate refusal to cooperate on the part of the magistrates in Antwerp, Bruges and Ghent, they did not ultimately persist in their efforts to pursue violations of the Brussels monopoly. They recognised the role which the papers played in the political and commercial life of their civic communities, and justly regarded these papers as local, commercial publications with little impact beyond their immediate surroundings. In 1690 the Privy Council actually abandoned the requirement that all newspapers be subject to preventative censorship—the practice had proven too demanding.<sup>58</sup> The only exception was the Relations véritables, which, as the court gazette of the Habsburg Netherlands, would have to be supervised in order to ensure that it reflected well on the Habsburg state.<sup>59</sup>

By the end of the seventeenth century the newspaper trade in the Southern Netherlands had settled into an equilibrium. The newspaper was a common feature of the media landscape, but the surviving papers would never enjoy the same national market as Dutch courantiërs did in the north. The Dutch Republic offered a larger and more integrated market. Of the four Dutch papers available in 1700, three were tri-weeklies. When Dutch newspapers emerged in The Hague, Delft and Rotterdam in the early eighteenth century these would all have tri-weekly schedules of publication. In the Southern Netherlands two Flemish papers remained, in Antwerp and Ghent. Both were bi-weeklies, and they catered almost exclusively to a local clientele. A few copies might be sold in Bruges, Brussels, Kortrijk, Ypres or Louvain, but the largest proportion of each issue was sold in their own city.<sup>60</sup> While the volume and diversity of newspapers in the Dutch Republic would increase during the eighteenth century, the Flemish press in the Southern Netherlands remained remarkably stable. The Antwerpsche Post-Tijdinge was published continuously throughout the eighteenth century; when the Ghendtsche Post-Tydinghen ceased publication in the early 1720s it was rapidly replaced by a new venture, the Gazette van Ghendt. The first Flemish newspapers in Mechelen and Louvain, two substantial urban centres in Brabant, would appear only in the final decades of the eighteenth century.<sup>61</sup> Most puzzlingly, the Flemish press in Bruges disappeared at the end of the seventeenth century, and only remerged in 1792. When Andreas Wydts petitioned the Council of Flanders to publish a newspaper in Bruges in 1717 the councillors rejected his proposal, and responded that to their knowledge no newspaper had ever been published in Bruges.<sup>62</sup> The competitive furore of the 1660s had left no trace. It is likely that after the death of the three newspaper publishers the magistrates of Bruges finally conceded to the earlier demands of the Privy Council and did not allow new courantiërs to continue their titles.

The remaining Flemish newspapers were small ventures compared to the leading Dutch titles in the north, or the Relations véritables in Brussels. But the fact that they were destined largely for a local audience does not mean that they were insignificant. By around 1800 the Gazette van Antwerpen had 700 subscribers in Antwerp, out of a population of 50,000.<sup>63</sup> Given that another 150 copies were distributed for free, and that some copies will have been sold to occasional customers, the paper had a considerable place in the urban consciousness.<sup>64</sup> The profits generated by these local papers were also substantial: the publisher of the Gazette van Antwerpen earned himself a handsome 3,321 gulden in 1772.<sup>65</sup> Increasingly, the revenue and success of the Antwerp and Ghent papers rested on the inclusion of advertisements and public announcements from local citizens. The Flemish newspapers had never become, like their northern counterparts, vehicles of publicity for the book trade or auction markets; the dissemination of the papers had never been large or wide enough. With the development of advertising towards the end of the seventeenth century, the Flemish newsmen were able to strengthen further the bonds between their titles and their civic communities.

The Life of the Courantier

To Jürgen Habermas, the emergence of the newspaper was a fundamental step in the birth of modern society.<sup>1</sup> Other historians have reiterated similar viewpoints. David McKitterick called newspapers “the most influential form of print ever invented.”<sup>2</sup> According to C. John Sommerville, the newspaper was responsible for a “new type of consciousness” which “politicised society.”<sup>3</sup> Anthony Smith likewise described the development of the newspaper as a progressive force in terms of its political influence.<sup>4</sup> The expansion of the newspaper was hailed, already by the end of the eighteenth century, as a triumph of civil society. In 1793 the writer Noah Webster argued in his American Minerva that “newspapers are not only the vehicles of what is called news; they are the common instruments of social intercourse.”<sup>5</sup>

In the seventeenth century many commentators would not have agreed. The appearance of the newspaper was met more often than not with satire or fear rather than admiration. A favoured topic of literati was the “news-crazed citizen”: gullible, politically-inexperienced, and exploited by a greedy newsman.<sup>6</sup> The English playwright Ben Jonson is today regarded as the archetypal satirist of early commercial news culture. In Jonson’s The Staple of News (1625) it mattered not what news was bought or sold, as long as it was fresh and controversial. In the first act of The Staple of News the master of the news staple (Cymbal) and his main accomplice (Fitton) explain the essentials of the news business:

Cymbal: To keep so many politics pens / Going to feed the press—
Fitton: And dish out news, / Were’t true or false ...<sup>7</sup>

Two decades after Jonson’s play was first staged an entire literary-political genre of anti-news pamphlets found an audience in Civil War England.<sup>8</sup> These were publications which attacked the flood of periodicals generated by the chaos of the political conflict. The Mercurius Anti-Mercurius (1648) complained: “Every Jack-sprat that hath but a pen in his ink-horn is ready to gather up the Excrements of the Kingdom ....”<sup>9</sup> Such attacks on the literary quality of newspapers were not uncommon. The prominent Dutch historian Jan Wagenaar (1709–1773) claimed that in order to become a writer of a newspaper one required “no correspondence, no historical knowledge, no judgement, no sound mind, and not even a decent grasp of one’s mother tongue.”<sup>10</sup>

Political and ecclesiastical commentators were equally fearful. Willem Teellinck (1579–1629), a Dutch Contra-Remonstrant minister, complained in a tract of 1626 that the citizens of the Dutch Republic were besotted by newspapers, “published and printed on a weekly basis, and read by many Christians who don’t bother to turn their eyes over the scripture even once a week.”<sup>11</sup> It was a vain practice, Teellinck insisted, to spend so much time trying to decipher worldly lies from worldly truths without considering the heavenly truth, so clearly presented by the Holy Scripture. Jacobus Hondius (1629–1691), a minister in Hoorn, echoed Teellinck’s sentiments when he lamented that each week “Church members read the newspaper two or three times (or listen to them being read), but do not read or listen to the Word of God one single time.”<sup>12</sup> The Irish writer John Toland (1670–1722) argued that newspapers could “poison the minds of the common people against his Majesty ... vilify his Ministers and disturb the public peace, to the scandal of all good government.”<sup>13</sup>

13 Hannah Barker, Newspapers, Politics and English Society, 1695–

When the magistrates of Utrecht banned Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht (c. 1622–1698) once again from publishing his newspapers, they justified their decision by claiming that he had published a report which led to their government being “accused and hated” by the local population.<sup>14</sup>

The magistrates’ actions stemmed from the assumption that it was a proper prerogative of a nation’s rulers to exercise control over the flow of news.<sup>15</sup> Regardless of its impact, the newspaper was perceived as a threat to the relatively exclusive access to political information previously enjoyed by the socio-political elite. News was judged as a finite resource; the appearance of more periodical news prompted anguish even if many newspapers tapped into similar sources for their reports. The newspaper, through its coverage of the affairs of state, highlighted the successes and failures of the policies and judgements of Europe’s political class.<sup>16</sup> While newspaper publishers generally trod carefully when it came to their coverage of domestic affairs, Dutch citizens could read about foreign princes—and they could access foreign publications which reported on their own regents.

One is left with a contrast of two extremes. Modern historians of the press have singled out their subject for particular importance in the development of modern civil society, while plenty of seventeenth-century commentators expressed little more than contempt and derision for the periodicals. But as Raymond argues, one should not rely too much on the statements of contemporaries: they are often repetitive and stereotypical.<sup>17</sup> The reactionary sentiments which followed the emergence of the press were not new. When manuscript newsletters proliferated in sixteenth-century Italy they inspired similar nervousness.<sup>18</sup> Handwritten news continued to be a source of significant concern to British and French authorities in the early 1700s.<sup>19</sup> Recent scholarly work on the history of news has moved significantly beyond the traditional historical narrative. Works by Andrew Pettegree, Joad Raymond, Jeremy Popkin, Brendan Dooley, Michiel van Groesen, and Paul Arblaster demonstrate that in order to understand the early press, one must also consider the perspectives of its producers and its customers.<sup>20</sup> The final two chapters of this study will address themselves to this task. The present chapter will consider the production of the newspaper and the challenges facing its publisher, the courantier; the final chapter discusses the experience of newspaper readers and the role of the public.

Networks

It was by no means easy, and certainly not cheap, to create a successful newspaper in the seventeenth century. The emergence of the newspaper was initially shaped by a straightforward model: to produce by a mechanical process hundreds of copies of a single newsletter, rather than write a dozen copies by hand. Yet this model possessed an inherent weakness: selling hundreds of newspapers was much more challenging than delivering a single newsletter to a particular client. A manuscript newsletter was an intimate and expensive product. It was created with a particular sort of customer in mind, and tailored to their needs. A competent newsletter writer could make a comfortable living selling newsletters to a relatively restricted group of wealthy customers. Printed newspapers, on the other hand were public and anonymous. They were too expensive to be bought by every literate citizen in town, yet too cheap to make the sale of 50 or 100 copies worthwhile. A newspaper could only become profitable if they could be sold regularly to hundreds of readers—and even then, as we will see, a publisher might only just break even.

The distribution and sale of newspapers required a wholly new infrastructure and set challenging logistical difficulties. For this was a period in which travel and transportation were generally expensive and slow. Once a newspaper had identified his market, he had to be confident that he could recoup the cost in the form of subscriptions. Payments would not come in every week, or every month. If all went smoothly, the publisher would receive lump sums from their customers and distributors at the end of the year. Sometimes, as the account books of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant in the 1720s and 1730s reveal, courantiers were paid one or two years late.<sup>21</sup> If business was poor and cash flow was limited, the wife or a close relative of the courantier would travel round the country to collect subscription fees. Otto Barentsz Smient, publisher of the Amsterdam Courante uyt Italien from 1655 onwards, warned subscribing booksellers on 25 May 1658 that an impostor claiming to be his nephew had gone round collecting Smient's subscription money.<sup>22</sup>

In the Low Countries newspaper publishers had the fortune to reside in a region with Europe's most advanced transport and information infrastructure. In urbanised Holland, Zeeland, Flanders and Brabant, the next city was never more than a few hours away, if that. A sophisticated system of man-made canals and natural waterways ensured rapid distribution of people, goods, capital and information. Major infrastructure projects in the second half of the seventeenth century led to the improvement of paved roads and canals, prompting the establishment of new postal routes and regular barge services across the Low Countries.<sup>23</sup> Citizens in northern Leeuwarden or eastern Arnhem could expect their Amsterdam newspaper on the same day as it was published. In the 1660s and 1670s the burghers of Leiden had little need for a local Dutch newspaper, given that they could buy multiple issues from The Hague, Haarlem and Amsterdam, all only two or three hours away. Municipal authorities announced to newspaper readers the latest schedules of canal barges or postal carriages: in 1662 citizens could travel between Delft and Leiden, via The Hague, thirteen times a day, with services leaving at roughly 90 minute intervals between 4am to 10pm.<sup>24</sup>

The first newspaper pioneers in the Low Countries, Broer Jansz, the Van Hiltens and Abraham Verhoeven, were well embedded in the publishing industry. They had many colleagues in the book trade to whom they could peddle their periodicals. Rather than pursue 300 different subscriptions, the courantiers minimised their distribution costs by sending out batches of copies to a limited number of agents, usually booksellers. It would then be up to the booksellers to organise subscriptions, though they undoubtedly also welcomed occasional sales from a stack available in the bookshop. David Beck, schoolmaster in The Hague, would seek out Jan van Hiltens in his shop around the corner from the bourse whenever he visited Amsterdam in the early 1620s. When he moved to Arnhem later in the decade, he would regularly visit Jan Jansz, the publisher of the Arnhemsche Courant, in order to read or buy the latest issue of his newspaper.<sup>25</sup> Throughout the century publishers specified on the imprint of their newspaper where customers could find their shop. Courantiers in The Hague, Weesp and Leiden would also note the location of specific Amsterdam booksellers who sold their weekly issues.<sup>26</sup>

Nevertheless, if a newspaperman wished to sell a print run of hundreds or thousands of copies, they could not rely on walk-in customers. Even in the mid-eighteenth century, the family Enschedé only sold 3% of their tri-weekly Oprechte Haerlemse Courant in their shop in Haarlem.<sup>27</sup> Newsmen also sold newspapers directly to local municipal authorities or official bodies, such as the VOC. While the authorities often demanded a large quantity of copies, and such bulk sales were obviously extremely welcome to a publisher, payments could be more difficult to collect from bureaucratic and debt-laden administrative bodies. Later generations of newsmen would make widespread use of hawkers, selling newssheets direct to customers on the streets.<sup>28</sup> But the organised use of hawkers seems to have been a phenomenon largely of the eighteenth century.

The largest proportion of the print run was distributed to booksellers, coffeehouse proprietors and postmasters spread far and wide throughout the Low Countries, from Franeker to Brussels, Bruges to Zwolle and Rotterdam to Maastricht.<sup>29</sup> These agents maintained subscribing lists of local customers, composed largely of the urban patriciate and the socially aspirant. In 1734 the tri-weekly 's Graevenhaegse Courant was despatched three times a week to booksellers and postmasters in twenty-six towns in the Dutch Republic, eight towns in the Southern Netherlands, three in the Holy Roman Empire and London.<sup>30</sup> In the Low Countries, the largest market would always be found in Amsterdam. In the middle of the eighteenth century 80% of the copies of the tri-weekly Amsterdamsche Courant were sold in Amsterdam; but newspapers published in Haarlem, The Hague and Leiden would also sell the majority of their issues in Amsterdam. When Adriaen Vlacq came to an agreement in 1663 with the Amsterdam bookseller Pieter Aertsen, he promised to despatch half the print run of his bi-weekly Haegse Post-Tydingen to Aertsen.<sup>31</sup> In 1734 the 's Graevenhaegse Courant made 40% of its revenue from the sale of newspapers in the Amsterdam market. Anthoni de Groot, courantier in The Hague in the 1740s, possessed as part of his inventory seven special leather bags “to send the newspapers to Amsterdam”.<sup>32</sup>

So much for selling; but of course before the copies could be printed the publisher faced the challenge of gathering and organising the news: and this too involved very considerable expense. If anything the difficulties of filling the pages of the newspaper week after week, and later even three times a week, posed more substantial logistical problems than collecting subscriptions. Here again, the first generation of courantiers relied on an established model: the hand-written newsletters, so popular with the regents and merchants of the later sixteenth century.<sup>33</sup> Early newspapers in the Low Countries were very similar in both design and tone to the traditional manuscript avvisi. Indeed, it seems that the earliest newspapers largely relied on making a digest of incoming avvisi, rather than, at this stage, creating their own network of correspondents. For this reason the reports in the first newspapers come very largely from places we would recognise as the major news hubs of the manuscript new services. The principal news centres of Italy and the Holy Roman Empire dominated these early newspapers: Rome, Venice, Vienna, Prague, Strasbourg, Leipzig, Frankfurt and Cologne. When the post from Cologne or Frankfurt was late to arrive, newspapermen could be left wringing his hands. On 30 April 1622 Broer Jansz apologised to his readers that a quarter of his double-sided newspaper was left blank. The reason, Jansz admitted, was that “the ordinary post from Cologne has not yet arrived”.<sup>34</sup> Such apologies were all too common in the newspapers of the seventeenth century, but they were all the more disastrous when a newsman did not diversify his news networks, and depended too greatly on one or two postal routes. Johannes Rammazeyn, who presented in his Wekelycke Nieuws (1652–1655) news from France and England only, rarely filled his newspaper due to his total dependence on favourable winds in the English Channel.<sup>35</sup> The same problem, though of course in the opposite direction, was a perennial problem of the London newspapers until the early nineteenth century.<sup>36</sup>

With the passage of time the structures of newsgathering inevitably evolved. The Thirty Years' War created a desperate need for news from the war zone, which moved from region to region with changes in the fortunes of the various contesting parties. As the war zone expanded, drawing in new adversaries and conflicts, other news hubs emerged. Capitals of belligerent nations, like Copenhagen and Stockholm, joined the roster of regular places of correspondence, together with intermediary communication hubs, such as Helsingør, Lübeck or Glückstadt. The exhausting conflict also created the first generation of embedded war correspondents. Throughout the summer reports were filed from the “Imperial camp” or “the army of the Duke of Turenne”, and so forth. Publishers entered the precise origin of the news: the siege of Stettin in 1677 was covered by newspapers in Amsterdam, Haarlem and Utrecht through reports from the “Brandenburg quarter”, the “Holstein quarter” and the “Saxon quarter”.<sup>37</sup> Periods of active campaigning accentuated the contrast between the business of newspapers in the summer months, and a more restricted digest of regular places of correspondence in winter. Newspapers in the campaigning season included numerous reports from the camp of the French army, the Imperial army in the Balkans, or even, for several long campaigns towards the end of the century, the Anglo-Dutch army camp in Ireland.

With the end of the Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia other conflicts emerged to fill the pages of the newspapers. War in England, then France and the Baltic region created new battlefields, and the need for new networks of correspondents. Throughout the 1650s and 1660s there was relatively little news from the Holy Roman Empire, the bulwark of news in the first half of the seventeenth century. Cities like Prague, Strasbourg and Leipzig disappeared almost completely from newspapers in the 1650s and 1660s. New hubs appeared to fill their place:

Livorno, Marseille, Warsaw and Königsberg soon featured regularly. Brussels, London and The Hague emerged from a second rank of political news centres to dominate the north-western European news theatre. More traditional hubs, such as Antwerp, waned with commercial and political decline.<sup>38</sup> Lyon, a key feature of the European network of manuscript news in the sixteenth century, scarcely featured as the locus of news reports in Dutch or Flemish newspapers in the seventeenth century.<sup>39</sup>

In the last decade of the seventeenth century the presence of a Dutch king on the throne of England reinforced the place of England in the Dutch news world. And to an extent not previously acknowledged, not all of this news was funnelled through London. By the third quarter of the century newspapers often featured four, six or even ten reports from London; but these were augmented by a host of additional reports from towns like Plymouth, Falmouth, Dartmouth, Portsmouth, Cowes, Liverpool, Deal, and many others. As we can see, many of these additional places of correspondence were ports along the south coast, small towns which might not previously have played a major part in the consciousness of the Dutch news-reading public. In these cases it may well have been that a single agent in Portsmouth or Plymouth aggregated the news before despatching it across the Channel. Similarly, news of the much-welcomed Habsburg success against the Ottomans in the 1680s and 1690s was channelled largely through Vienna and Venice, even if publishers would still describe their news reports excitedly as originating from “the camp before Belgrade” or the “army outside Petrovaradin”.

Later in the century news from beyond the confines of continental Europe also became more prominent. The newspaper reader could follow from a vast distance events unfolding in Constantinople, Moscow, the Caribbean, Boston, New York, Surinam, the Cape of Good Hope and the East Indies. Readers could marvel at the incoming goods of colonial convoys of spices and rarities as newsmen began regularly to list the tantalising cargoes of Dutch, French, English and Danish Indiamen brought into port. By the end of the seventeenth century the wars of Louis XIV, fought across the breadth of Europe, made an extensive news network (and its eye-watering cost) indispensable. Newspaper readers had come to expect reports from around the European continent in every issue. While many newspapers from the early seventeenth century cultivated particular geographical spheres of specialism, the courantier at the end of the century had to furnish news from as comprehensive a range as places as possible.

When Daniel van Gaesbeeck (1634–1693) started a newspaper in Leiden in 1686, he could not afford to launch his venture without a significant range of correspondents. While François Lieshout, Willem Verdussen and Nicolaes Breyghel started their weekly newspapers in the 1630s with eight or ten reports per issue, Van Gaesbeeck featured at least twenty reports in his first issue, published on 30 March 1686. This included reports from places as diverse as Rome, Turin, Brest, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Celle, London and Regensburg, but also contained an apologetic note: Van Gaesbeeck implored the reader that “not all of my correspondence arrived in time for this first issue, so the reader will find that my news will soon expand and improve”.<sup>40</sup> It was essential that a courantier secured enough correspondents before he started a newspaper. The Amsterdam newsman Mathijs van Meininga, who published the Europische Courant between 1642 and 1646, was engaged in an active search for a correspondent in London months before he published his first issue.<sup>41</sup> When Martin Binnart applied for a licence to publish a newspaper in Antwerp in 1635 he specified to the Council of Brabant that he had already established relationships with multiple Catholic correspondents in Vienna, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Münster and Paris.<sup>42</sup> In his petition to start a newspaper in 1666 Joannes Naeranus in Rotterdam notified the local magistrates that he had already identified trusted correspondents in Italy, France, England and other regions.<sup>43</sup>

Van Gaesbeeck's efforts are all the more extraordinary when one considers that he was the first publisher in the Low Countries to start his newspaper as a tri-weekly. This was a serious gamble, and did not pay off for Van Gaesbeeck. After four months of publication Van Gaesbeeck resigned as courantier, and was replaced by Lodewijk vander Saen (fl. 1686–1689). Other courantiers who published tri-weeklies had started with one or two weekly issues, gradually building up a solid base of subscribers. Finding enough correspondence to fill a third issue proved difficult even for the most accomplished newsmen in the market. The Thursday issue was always weaker than those published on Tuesday or Saturday, even in the case of a prince of the industry such as Abraham Casteleyn. In the 1660s and 1670s Casteleyn used a larger black letter typeface in greater abundance for his Thursday issues to conceal the relative paucity of news. It was a graceful strategy, but few regular readers would have been deceived.

The problem of the Thursday issue was one that would bedevil the Dutch newspaper industry for the best part of a century after Van Gaesbeeck first launched his bold initiative.<sup>44</sup> Up to this point, there was generally fresh news to be bought on a Thursday, but usually published in a venture published exclusively on that day, or as a bi-weekly on Monday and Thursday. For a single publisher to publish three issues in a week was logistically ambitious. It left only one day after the Tuesday edition was put to bed to gather and edit the news. The flow of news was often not sufficient to fill three issues. A tri-weekly also strained the patience and the pockets of subscribers. Those who had the money to buy news on more than two days of the week might in any case prefer to get it from a variety of sources; in Holland's major cities, of course, one could also obtain newspapers published elsewhere, offering a different perspective and access to a network of correspondents maintained by a different publisher.

So the Thursday edition was always recognisably weaker than the Tuesday and Saturday issues, as is evident from the far lower number of reports they normally carried.<sup>45</sup> The print run may well have been substantially lower. Not surprisingly advertisers were more reluctant to pay to place their notices in an issue that would reach far fewer potential customers, so there was not even the option for the proprietors of filling the vacant space with additional advertisements. One might therefore wonder why the publishers of tri-weekly papers persevered. The truth was that the Thursday dilemma was one born of the incessant and ever growing demand for news. By the end of the seventeenth century there were no more newspapers to be found in the Low Countries published only in a single weekly issue. This new norm also raised the start-up price for any entrepreneur trying to establish a foothold in the newspaper trade.

To maintain a network of correspondents was extraordinarily expensive. Andreas Tolner, Van Meininga's news writer in London, demanded 200 gulden per year for his services.<sup>46</sup> Van Meininga could only offer him 150 gulden. In an era when the average wage of a Dutch household was around 500 gulden, it was a serious decision to take on a permanent correspondent like Tolner. But Tolner's demands were not extortionate by the standards of the industry. In the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries a salary of 150 or 200 gulden for a regular news correspondent was very much the going rate. Courantier Jacobus de Jongh in The Hague paid 2,407 gulden for correspondents and foreign newspapers in 1733–1734.<sup>47</sup> He maintained three correspondents in England, two in France, and one in Venice, Hamburg, Saxony, Frankfurt, Düsseldorf, Brussels, Amsterdam, Rotterdam and The Hague. In the 1730s the Enschedés in Haarlem laid out a similar amount each year for their correspondents.<sup>48</sup> Many courantiers, like De Jongh and the Enschedés, maintained several correspondents in the same city. By the second half of the seventeenth century the most prolific newsmen in the Dutch Republic began to present two, three, four or five reports from news centres like Paris and London in their issues. Sometimes these multiple reports were sent over on successive days during the course of the week by a single correspondent, but they could also be despatched on the same day by different news writers.

Who were these news correspondents? In the vast majority of cases the names of individual correspondents will remain a mystery. It would be several centuries before correspondents would be credited in the newspapers for their work; the by-line lay a long way in the future. We have only snippets of information which reveal the sort of people who would provide regular correspondence for newspaper publishers. Some were foreign statesmen, like Joseph Williamson, or intellectuals, like Samuel Hartlib; men who corresponded not for cash, but for access to other news circles and networks maintained by a courantier. It is likely that the majority of correspondents were postmasters or professional news agents: men like Lieuwe van Aitzema and Abraham de Wicquefort, who operated in opaque spheres of diplomacy, espionage and commercial news writing. Newspaper publishers also sourced their news from other newspapers, published at home and abroad. These they could scour for noteworthy stories, or use to verify previous reports. By the mid-eighteenth century, the writers of the Amsterdamsche Courant read newspapers published in Leiden, The Hague, Haarlem, Utrecht, Cologne, Hamburg, Altona, Brussels, Paris and Madrid.<sup>49</sup>

Cheaper sources could be found closer to home. News-men would include reports they had overheard at the bourse, on the square or at the docks. This was particularly the case with reports published towards the end of the newspaper, in the space reserved for domestic news (or, more properly, news gathered from sources in the Dutch Republic). Reports often began with the statement that “passengers from England state that”, “rumours in Antwerp say that”, or “we have nothing special from the sea [that is, from incoming ships]”.<sup>50</sup> In the 1680s and 1690s the Amsterdam courantier Casparus Commelijn would receive news reports from his colleague Aart Dircksz Oossaan, who sold the newspaper, because Oossaan frequently picked up news from merchants conversing at the bourse, located around the corner from his shop.<sup>51</sup> Newsmen solicited correspondence from merchants, friends, and colleagues in their town. Joannes Naeranus, courantier in Rotterdam, apologised in his newspaper of 29 July 1666 (at the height of the Second Anglo-Dutch War) that

The English letters have not yet arrived; a certain English merchant living here [in Rotterdam] had written to his brother in London to ask whether he could write him some news now and again, yet his brother answered that he dared not write, and asked him not to write from Holland again, so that he would not have to explain himself.<sup>52</sup>

We can also learn of the sources of news content through judicial cases. The reliability of news reports were more easily compromised if they had been related orally to the courantier. If the newsman had received a problematic report by letter from a regular correspondent, proof was easily presented to the authorities that the report was copied faithfully, and that the courantier had not tried to fabricate or embellish the news. When Joannes Naeranus printed a report in his Rotterdam newspaper on 22 July 1666 that the admirals of the Dutch fleet had slackened their blockade of the river Thames, he was prosecuted by the States of Holland. He explained to the States, as he later justified in his newspaper, that the report had turned out to be “an infamous lie”, which he himself had heard from one Captain Wijnbergen, who had “spoken this news in presence of various witnesses”.<sup>53</sup> Crispijn Hoeck-water, courantier in The Hague, was suspended by the Court of Holland in 1667 after printing a seditious report on the peace negotiations at Breda; but the suspension was reduced when he explained that he himself had heard the report at the Court.<sup>54</sup> Hoeckwater admitted that this was a common practice: he frequented the Court daily to pick up snippets of news.

Relata Refero?

Johann Hermann Knoop, the writer of the 1758 handbook on newspaper reading, opened his work with a quote from Herodotus’ Histories:

Relata Refero. That is, I will tell it as it has been told to me.<sup>55</sup>

To Knoop, it was this phrase which best captured the essence of the early newspaper. The courantier was required to copy faithfully news reports composed by news writers or published in other newspapers. He was not a commentator: that was both the guiding ethical principle of the seventeenth-century newspaper publisher, and his greatest protection against prosecution for the contents of his paper. For this reason early newspapers have often been derided for their bland covering of political events, with a lack of political spirit or engagement. But the process of editing the news for publication forced the editor to make many choices. On 8 August 1712 Joseph Addison complained in The Spectator that all newspapermen receive the same advices from abroad, and very often in the same words; but their way of cooking it is so different, that there is no citizen, who has an eye to the public good, who can leave the coffee-house with peace of mind.<sup>56</sup>

Addison, of course, was writing in a very different context, in the era when the London press had developed in a highly partisan direction. But the point also had relevance for the more cautious Dutch press. In this respect the choice of what to leave out was already freighted with political meaning, even if the editor did not add anything of his own.<sup>57</sup> This was to some extent a problem of plenty.

In the first decades of the newspaper publishers worried more about whether they would have enough news to fill their pages. In 1645, even as accomplished a newsman as Jan van Hilten had to record that nothing “worthy of writing” had come from England.<sup>58</sup> As we have seen, the English news offered the particular challenges of sea-borne intelligence; it could arrive very swiftly, but on other occasions contrary winds would introduce a meteorological news embargo that could last for weeks. Two issues of the Antwerpsche Post-Tijdinge of 1700 have gaping holes in the text, which turn out to be blank blocks with a header indicating that space had been reserved for reports from London (see ill. 5.1).<sup>59</sup> Evidently the news from London had been confidently expected, but had still not arrived. This was crude, and most Dutch newsmen would have regarded this as another example of sloppy Flemish practice. The fact that this occurs as late as 1700 indicates how far Antwerp had fallen from its place at the centre of the news world.

More often publishers in the Dutch Republic were faced with an abundance of news, and difficult choices of what to include. The Haegsche Weekelycke Mercurius of 12 May 1656 contains a final note that “The Swedish affairs have taken up so much space that we have no room left to communicate reports from Italy.”<sup>60</sup> This sort of confessional tone is very rare. Newsmen regarded it as their job, their craft, to make such choices, and felt no obligation to give a running commentary of what they had left out, and why. But we can get some sense of the day-to-day business of putting together an issue by late coming news. On occasions this involved stopping the press to make an adjustment to the copy, usually at the bottom of the last column (the second column of the reverse sheet). The Amsterdamsche Courante of 25 July 1690 went to press with sixteen reports and eight advertisements, and included the first news of King William’s victory at the battle of the Boyne.<sup>61</sup> But while it was still on the press, further news arrived from England concerning the victory. Many newspapermen would at this point have put out an extra issue, “an extraordinary”, with these additional reports. Because part of the original print run had still to go out from the shop (presumably for the local market in Amsterdam), Casparus Commelijn chose instead to stop the press, drop all the advertisements and reports from Copenhagen and

Bremen, and offer instead a speech by the ambassador of the Queen of England to the States General celebrating the victory, a report from Hamburg, two reports from London and an additional report from The Hague.<sup>62</sup> This was shrewd: Commelijn's Amsterdam customers would have been most likely to have been the first to hear the news in any case, and it did nothing for the reputation of the newspaper if it had nothing to say on such a crucial event that they had already heard about by word of mouth. Yet clearly the changes were not substantial enough, because by the end of the day Commelijn did indeed issue a special issue filled exclusively with reports from Dublin and London.<sup>63</sup>

We can follow this busy day in the print shop because both the original and the variant edition have survived, together with the special issue. Given that 60% of the documented corpus of newspapers survives in only one copy, such cases have often been obscured. But this must have been a common enough experience, and dilemma, for the Dutch newsmen, for it was neither easy nor uncomplicated to make substantial adjustments to the text in this way. It was therefore often a preferred strategy to go to press with the original text, but with a supplement published immediately thereafter. The Amsterdamsche Courante of 31 March 1696 contained at the end a notice stating that "a supplement [Na-courant] will be published around 10 am containing the last two posts from England."<sup>64</sup> In the issue of 19 May of the same year the first advertisement states that "because the last English letters have not arrived, a supplement will be published near noon."<sup>65</sup> Both of these special issues have survived.<sup>66</sup>

This was not a problem that would get easier to deal with at any point in the age of sail. As late as 1767 the manager of the printing office of the Amsterdamsche Courant was offered precise written instructions how to deal with such a situation:

In the case that a letter from The Hague or England arrives in the evening on one of the printing days, efforts must be made to include as much content from the letters in the newspaper, and in case of remarkable tidings which cannot be placed in the newspaper, a special issue must be composed and printed, for which additional apprentices can be called up, and for which the workmen will receive additional wages.<sup>67</sup>

One could well imagine the atmosphere in the workshop where the printer was faced with an insistent demand to change text while the text was printing, for print days were already a time of frantic activity. Printing a newspaper was a business with little time for reflection and perspective. Théophraste Renaudot, the publisher of the Paris Gazette, and one of the true giants of the industry, would express the newsman's lament, speaking here for most in the profession:

If the fear of displeasing their century has prevented great authors from touching the history of their age, what must be the difficulty in writing the news of the week, indeed, of the very day on which it is published? Add to it the brevity of time which our characteristic impatience permits me, and I would be very mistaken if the rudest of critics could not find something to criticise in a work which must be done in four hours, which the arrival of couriers each week leaves me to compose, adjust and print these lines.<sup>68</sup>

Yet despite this, newsmen did find the time to reflect on the values of their profession. On 1 January 1667, by which time the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant was established as one of the most prominent newspapers of Europe, Casteleyn offered this reflection on the past year, and the news publisher's vocation:

The greatly anticipated year 1666 has come to an end without any of the prognostications made by inventive prophets fulfilled ... Throughout the year truly nothing happened which the Lord God did not already allow to happen in the past; and the Jews, who had imagined that something terrifying was to happen [this year] have been most deceived. Our Lord God, we pray to you that we will henceforth rely more on reason, and believe in truth.<sup>69</sup>

Not all newspapermen had Casteleyn's eloquence. But a sense of the editorial values that underpinned the whole trade can still shine through in the columns of the papers. First of all there was a rigorous adherence to truth; a sense that news must above all be accurate and reliable. When publishers found that they had published a misleading report, they were often at pains to correct this in the next available issue. Here, again, from Casteleyn:

In the last Saturday issue it was related at the end in a report from London of 7 December that the Duke of York had been present at the latest sessions [of Parliament] etc., which was printed inaccurately due to a printing mistake, and should have read: the Earl of Bristol had been present at the latest sessions, etc.<sup>70</sup>

This might seem a relatively minor error to require a precious paragraph of the paper. Other corrections by Casteleyn related to more significantly misleading reports. On 4 May 1669 he had published a report which gave a seriously misleading impression of the balance of forces in the Mediterranean:

It has been found that the report from Málaga dated 9 April and inserted in my newspaper last Saturday 4 May, [in which is narrated] that the English, out of fear for the Turks, have left the strait of Gibraltar, is untrue, and that the contrary is true, indeed, that several English warships only departed briefly to re-victual, and that there is a considerable fleet in England at present to depart for the strait, to find the Turk, and to ruin him and bring him to reason.<sup>71</sup>

In some cases the publisher was relatively blameless. They, like the original protagonists, had been the victims of a deliberate fraud:

In the newspaper of the 20th this month there was included a report from Regensburg of the 11th of March, in which was told that a certain individual presented himself as the Baron of Wassenaar to the Lord Petrus Valckenier, extraordinary envoy of the States in Regensburg, and that he had enjoyed dinner with the same; but I have since been notified by the family of Wassenaar that the baron has not travelled through Germany recently, in fact, that he has not travelled at all for the last six years, and so they suggested that there must be a person who has taken up the title of baron falsely, with intent to perpetrate many falsehoods.<sup>72</sup>

This, incidentally, offers a rare example of readers engaging in correspondence to correct a misapprehension in the newspaper. In contrast to England, and particularly the English provincial papers of the eighteenth century, reader contributions play little part in the Dutch newspapers in their first century.<sup>73</sup>

Sometimes the newspapers were themselves victims of poor intelligence; one of the dangers inherent in publishing word of mouth reports. On 12 September 1665 Casteleyn placed an apology in his Oprechte Haerlemse Courant that a report of the week before regarding the arrest of the Lord of Dorrewaert was false.<sup>74</sup> Casteleyn claimed that it was given to him by an "evil-doing person".

These sorts of mea culpa were painful for a newsman, though it speaks volumes for Casteleyn's general reputation that he could make such admissions of inaccuracy without damaging his own reputation; perhaps, indeed, the frank recognition of fault actually enhanced it. But it did mean that when newspaper publishers saw examples of sloppy reporting in other papers they reacted with a vengeful anger, quite at variance with the normal tone of sober reporting that characterises the general content of seventeenth-century newspapers. Otto Barentsz Smient placed a lengthy note at the end of his Amsterdamsche Courant of 23 February 1673 to highlight that a report from Copenhagen placed in the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant of 7 January had not, as the Haarlem paper had contended, been written by ambassador Le Maire, but by the lord of Werkendam.<sup>75</sup>

This was civil enough, but on occasions the need to set the record straight had a personal edge: the correction of error became an accusation of professional incompetence, or worse. Abraham Casteleyn had a grudge against Broer Appelaer, publisher of the Utrechtse Courant, in the later 1670s. On 29 February 1677 Casteleyn remarked in his paper that "the Utrecht courantier ... who speaks of affairs of which he knows nothing, does not merit a response".<sup>76</sup>

On 11 July 1679 he stated that “the reader should not expect an answer to the insults of the Utrecht courantier, for he does not merit an answer”.<sup>77</sup> Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht too was publicly derided by Otto Barentsz Smient in his Courante uyt Italien in 1659 and by Joannes Naeranus in his Oprechte Rotterdamse Zee-en Post-tijdingen in 1666 for insults published by Van der Macht in his newspaper.<sup>78</sup> Willem Arnold of the Amsterdamsche Courant was perplexed in 1698 when his competitor in Leiden, Jacob van Huysduynen, managed to get hold of letters from Rome a day and a half before Arnold did:

While the Italian letters will be published at 10:30 this evening [in a special issue], we have read with amazement the advices from Rome of 15 November printed in the Leydse Courant of 5 December, and have not understood how the courantier [of the Leydse Courant] was able to get hold of these, except if his letters have been delivered by Pegasus, riding across the sky.<sup>79</sup>

The implication of Arnold’s pointed comment, placed at the end of his newspaper, was that Van Huysduynen had fabricated the news report, rather than wait, like Arnold, for the late arrival of the letters.

Courantiers reserved their greatest scorn for competing news from abroad. During times of war newsmen regularly vented their anger at foreign news which exaggerated Dutch losses. On 5 April 1653, after the Dutch had suffered a naval defeat against the English, Jan Jacobsz Bouman offered his readers the following consolation:

One cannot stop wondering about the incessant shamefulness of the current rulers of England, who seek to fool the entire world, as is their common practice, by claiming that the great victory which they have gained against us saw them capture seventy merchant ships and ten warships, and that they have shot to smithereens sixteen of our warships on top of that. If it is true that they have taken so many ships, why don’t they name them, instead of giving only a few names and promising to make up a list of all of them later? They certainly won’t do that, not only because they could not possibly fulfil it, but also because they can’t bear to communicate the current state of their own fleet, which they usually do [after a battle].<sup>80</sup>

During the Second Anglo-Dutch War Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht took to printing in his newspaper the “lies” arriving from Britain. After presenting his own take on the news, he humoured his readers with “another written lie, from London”.<sup>81</sup> A month later, on 30 August 1666, Van der Macht embarked upon an extensive campaign of invective against several “Papist” newspapers. He singled out Peter Verdussen in Antwerp for claiming falsely in his Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe that Dutch sailors were complaining about their treatment by their superiors, and that several reports from Brussels suggested that the English had landed at Scheveningen with 1,000 troops and looted The Hague, or that they had conquered Haarlem. Van der Macht concluded that “the good reader is advised not to give any credit [to these publications], but to discard their disgusting lies, and to regard these aforementioned newspapers from Cologne, Brussels, Antwerp, Bruges and Roermond ... as nothing but made-up lies.”<sup>82</sup>

At the end of the seventeenth century, when France had become the nemesis of the Dutch state, it was French news which bore the brunt of criticism in Dutch newspapers. In a special issue of 11 September 1675, the Amsterdamsche Courant mused that

Now that the French have been halted in their tracks, and that their couriers arriving from the front can only bring back bad news, they have found a way to obscure these tidings in a most sinister way, and at the same time fabricate reports which speak of victories, in order to calm the population.<sup>83</sup>

This is more reminiscent of the mutual abuse between the Amsterdam newsmen and Abraham Verhoeven at the beginning of the century, than name-calling and snippy corrections within the Dutch trade. It was to be expected that papers in the service of the enemy would put a different gloss on news, to cheer their own news-reading populations; readers of Dutch papers would not have been surprised by this. The rivalries within the Dutch news world were more corrosive, and more dangerous for the credibility of the trade. Before denouncing a competitor in the local market news publishers had to consider whether such fault finding damaged the industry as a whole; whether they themselves might be damaged by the suggestion that the newspapers were, in general, not to be trusted. The fact that examples of newspapers directly denouncing other publications are so rare suggests they were not unmindful of this. Newspapermen were very aware of how difficult it was to run a paper, to cope with the torrent of incoming reports; the life of the courantier left little time for fact-checking. Everyone could publish reports which later proved to be unreliable. It was, on the whole, best not to allude to this, even if another paper seemed sloppy in comparison to one's own. In any case, if one wanted to damage the competition, a quiet word with the local authorities was usually more effective than pungent abuse in the columns of your own paper.

Toil and Investment

Day in, day out, the courantier received, drafted, forwarded and responded to letters. Rival newspapers had to be scanned quickly while the courantier composed his own paper, eyeing his pocket watch nervously. Many publishers had to supervise the production process of their paper, often interrupting the compositors and the pressmen when a late coming report reached the print shop. Some publishers, especially earlier in the century, were themselves engaged in the physical toil of production. There was little respite from this process. There were only two days on which newspapers in the Low Countries would generally not be published: Ascension Day and Christmas Day.<sup>84</sup> In the Southern Netherlands Abraham Verhoeven and his successors often avoided publication on Saints' days as well.<sup>85</sup> But this religious rest did not afford much respite for the publishers: while they could not publish on these days of rest, they could not skip the issue, instead publishing the issue a day earlier or later.

Given the endurance required for the publication of a newspaper, it is no surprise that many courantiers fell ill, or died an early death. On 10 September 1667 Abraham Casteleyn notified his readers that no Thursday issue of his Oprechte Haerlemse Courant had appeared; the publisher had been laid low by an illness.<sup>86</sup> This was only several months after Casteleyn had expanded his newspaper from a bi-weekly to a tri-weekly paper. He was certainly not the only courantier to apologise for a missed issue. The anonymous publisher of the Uytgesochte Nieuwe Tydingen specified on 15 July 1684 that "due to intervening hindrances our work has been delayed for eight days, although we endeavour to continue once more."<sup>87</sup> Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht apologised on 2 August 1657 that due to "an unhappy accident I was hindered from writing more extensively."<sup>88</sup> In each of these cases, as was normal in the seventeenth-century newspaper world, there was no assistant or deputy editor to take up the task if the publisher was incapacitated. Such were the perils of an enterprise which relied on the guiding spirit of a single individual. Sheer exhaustion most likely claimed the life of the Utrecht courantier Broer Appelaer (1636–1690).<sup>89</sup> During his career Appelaer was pursued relentlessly by foreign diplomatic representatives and Dutch regents for the publication of abrasive or false reports. When the Utrecht magistrates banned his Utrechtse Courant in 1690 after yet another complaint, he died within days of the suspension.

Most seventeenth-century courantiers died in post. A few, such as Crispijn Hoeckwater (1642–1731), enjoyed a long life after the failure of their venture, but the majority of publishers passed away in the middle of their schedule of publication, still thinking of the content of next week's issue. The average lifespan of seventeenth-century newspaper publishers was around 40–55 years.<sup>90</sup> Men like François Lieshout (c. 1596–1646) and Joost Broersz (1608/1609–1647), two Amsterdam courantiers, both died with ten years of starting a newspaper. Yet the death of the courantier did not often herald the end of a newspaper. Usually they were succeeded by their widow, sons or daughters. Hereditary succession was not guaranteed, but it was a widely accepted practice in the print industry as a whole, and seems to have been immediately accepted as the norm in the new world of newspaper publishing. Dynastic succession could sometimes be challenged by other publishers in the trade, especially if the successor was judged to be inexperienced or incompetent. In 1676 the Ghent printer Michiel Maes petitioned the Privy Council in Brussels to take over the Ghendtsche Post-Tydinghen after the death of Maximiliaen Graet, complaining that Graet's widow, Jacoba de Somere, had no knowledge of French or other foreign languages.<sup>91</sup>

At other times the widow of a courantier could decide to retire, and sell the privilege of her newspaper to a new publisher. When Adriaen Vlacq died in 1667, his successor, Crispijn Hoeckwater, notified readers that he had become the new publisher because Vlacq's widow had no intention of continuing the venture.<sup>92</sup> The widow of Broer Jansz, Lijsbeth Philips, allowed Jan Jacobsz Bouman, son-in-law of Broer Jansz, to publish the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren in exchange for a 400 gulden pension paid by Bouman to herself and the heirs of Broer Jansz.<sup>93</sup>

If they chose to continue the venture, widows often outlasted their husbands in the role of courantier. Willemijn-tje Broerz, the widow of Joost Broersz, published the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante from 1647 until her death in 1661; Sara Vlamincx, the widow of François Lieshout, published their Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante for twenty-three years, much longer than her late husband's eight years as newspaper publisher. Margaretha van Bancken, the wife of Abraham Casteleyn, became stadsdrukker and courantier after the death of her husband in 1681. The families of Maximiliaen Graet in Ghent and Willem Verdussen in Antwerp—wives, sons and daughters—continued their newspapers for decades after the death of their husband and father. In doing so, they rarely revealed their identity, preferring to maintain the name of the newspaper's male founder on the imprint.

A bad relationship with one's wife could spell disaster for a newspaper. Abraham Verhoeven's notorious conflict with his first wife was the principle source of his financial ruin and caused him much personal anguish. The demise of Hoeckwater's Haegse Post-Tydingen in the later 1670s was likely related to a broken marriage, resulting in a divorce in the early 1680s.<sup>94</sup> Marital infighting was such a serious problem for a courantier because they generally relied upon the entire household to take part in the duties surrounding the production of the newspaper. Wives and children often managed the shop, cleaned, and prepared food, if they did not assist in the administration, proof-reading or writing. It is very difficult to uncover the extent of involvement of the wider family in the workshop and editing process. Yet the ease with which widows, children, or entire families like the Graets or the Verdussens committed themselves to the publication of a newspaper suggests that they played a significant role in the day-to-day business of the newspaper trade.

No seventeenth-century sources have survived which can provide us with greater detail on the individuals involved in the production of a newspaper, but the archive of the city of Amsterdam contains valuable information on the production of the tri-weekly Amsterdamsche Courant in the middle of the eighteenth century.<sup>95</sup> In 1767 the Amsterdamsche Courant was produced by two writers, four compositors, two pressmen and a printer's apprentice. The team was supported by an accountant and the manager of the print shop.<sup>96</sup> The newspaper appeared on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, so the staff were required to arrive at work at 8 am on Monday, Wednesday and Friday. They would work until 4 or 5 am the next day, an excruciating 20-hour shift.<sup>97</sup> The next day they would be allowed to rest, save for a four-hour cleaning shift, preparing the equipment and stocking the shop ready for the following day's efforts.

By the middle decades of the eighteenth century the Amsterdamsche Courant was one of the largest titles in the Dutch Republic: each issue was published in 4,000–6,000 copies.<sup>98</sup> Without major technological advances the production of additional copies could only be realised by an increase in manpower and stamina. During the same period the bi-weekly Gazette van Antwerpen in the Southern Netherlands was a much smaller affair.<sup>99</sup> The Gazette van Antwerpen was the direct successor of the Antwerpsche Post-Tijdinge, published from the 1690s by the Verdussen family, and taken over by Hendrik (III) Aertssens. In 1772 the Gazette was produced by one compositor, one printer, and one apprentice. The print run of the Gazette did not exceed 1,500 copies, most of which were sold locally.<sup>100</sup>

It is likely that most seventeenth-century newspapers were produced on the scale of the late eighteenth-century Gazette van Antwerpen rather than the Amsterdamsche Courant. Most courantiers seem to have produced their newspapers on one printing press; even the Leiden courantier Jacob van Huysduynen, who published a tri-weekly newspaper from 1689 until 1719, possessed only a single printing press.<sup>101</sup> Notable exceptions are Abraham Casteleyn in Haarlem and his tri-weekly Oprechte Haerlemse Courant, as well as the Amsterdamsche Courant in the final decades of the seventeenth century. Jan van Hilten and Broer Jansz also seem to have used a second press for their newspapers in the 1630s or 1640s, judging by the survival of variant issues.

Without archival sources, it is difficult to arrive at definitive figures for the weekly circulation of seventeenth-century newspapers. Scholars have thus far offered various estimates for the early weekly Amsterdam papers: Dahl conjectured around 400 copies, Haks suggested 500–600 copies, and Couvée also ventured an estimate of 600 copies.<sup>102</sup> These figures may be accurate for the first two decades of newspaper publication, but thereafter they seem to be somewhat conservative. The newspapers of Jan van Hilten and Broer Jansz were sold and read throughout the country; Van Hilten despatched twelve copies to a Leeuwarden bookseller each week, and twenty-four copies to a Nijmegen bookseller. In all likelihood Van Hilten sold his newspaper in another twenty towns throughout the Dutch Republic. Booksellers in Leiden, The Hague, Rotterdam, Utrecht and Haarlem, more considerable markets than Nijmegen and Leeuwarden, will have received more than twenty-four copies each week. In addition, Van Hilten had to satisfy numerous customers at home, in Amsterdam. I consider it likely that by 1650 the two major Amsterdam papers circulated in at least 1,000 copies per issue, if not more. This would be a reasonable comparison given what we know of the circulation of the Paris Gazette and newsbooks printed in England around the same time.<sup>103</sup>

A 1675 tax bill for the Amsterdamsche Courant, hitherto not used by scholars, provides a more reliable estimate for the later seventeenth century. All four Amsterdam courantiers active in 1675 were charged 204 gulden in newspaper tax for the first three months of 1675.<sup>104</sup> Each courantier printed ten issues during this period. Given that each copy of an issue was taxed at four penningen, the circulation of each issue was at least 1,600 copies. It is likely that issues of the two remaining Flemish newspapers, published in Antwerp and Ghent, were produced in around a third of this number. These bi-weekly newspapers had a more restricted range of customers, relying on their local urban markets for the greater part of their clientele.

As we have seen, the production of a newspaper called for significant investment. Payments to correspondents were the largest expense, and this was a fixed cost that would have to be paid before the courantier would recoup any revenue from subscriptions on his newspaper. Any potential newsman was also required to devote thousands of gulden to the equipment necessary for the publication of a newspaper. In 1747, when Anthoni de Groot was briefly suspended as courantier in The Hague, an inventory was made of the equipment used by him to produce the tri-weekly newspaper.<sup>105</sup> The total value of his equipment came to 4,572 gulden and 10 stuivers—the price of a decent home in a Holland town. The equipment included three printing presses (worth 225 gulden each), and a considerable array of typefaces, including special typefaces for advertisements (worth 800 gulden). He also possessed three cut emblems of the coat of arms of The Hague (worth 45 gulden), several account books for the sale of the newspaper and the placement of advertisements (worth 40 gulden), and “dictionaries, atlases, and other books necessary for the writing of the newspaper” (worth 200 gulden).

The pioneers of the news trade at the beginning of the seventeenth century certainly did not possess the same quantity of equipment as Anthoni de Groot in 1747. The first courantiers operated small family businesses. They were, like Broer Jansz and Abraham Verhoeven, men who had made their careers as apprentices in the book trade, or as compositors, engravers and jobbing printers. Once they started a newspaper they were engaged in every stage of the production process, from newsgathering to distribution. An editorial misstep could see the courantier lose their position, and with it, their daily income.

By the end of the century, the first two generations of newsmen had been replaced by a very different type of newspaper proprietor. Many were no long fully employed in the business of news; they included scholars, lawyers and regents, men for whom running a newspaper played a subsidiary part in a life lived in the comfortable upper echelons of Holland society. Willem Arnold, Johannes (III) van Ravesteyn and Casparus Commelijn were men of this stamp. They had bought an existing newspaper license or found themselves appointed to the management of the local newspaper thanks to friends and family in municipal government. They were university educated and knew their ways around the upper echelons of civic society. They employed printers, booksellers and apprentices to take care of the daily production and distribution of their newspaper, while devoting themselves to news gathering and writing. They could treat their newspaper as an investment, using their capital to improve their network of correspondence, but never overcommitting their financial resources.

The most successful newsman of the century, Abraham Casteleyn, made significant profits by managing an exclusive handwritten newsletter service alongside his printed newspaper. He courted statesmen at home and abroad, and cultivated friendships in the tight-knit circle of Haarlem regents. In recognition of his efforts the magistrates protected Casteleyn's monopoly and concealed his dubious newsgathering practices and tax evasion from investigations by the Court of Holland. In 1698, they agreed to vote Abraham's son, Gerard, into the city council, effectively lifting the Casteleyn family into the highest ranks of Dutch society. Casteleyn had transformed the role of the courantier in the seventeenth century from a craftsman, sweating away in a badly-lit print shop, to a scholarly commentator, observing the world around him and providing discussion-material for his aristocratic friends.

Politics, Public and the Periodical Press in the Low Countries

On 18 August 1656 the Haegsche Weekelycke Mercurius featured a report from The Hague. It presented nine different developing news stories, each summarised in a single sentence:

From Danzig there is word of an engagement in which the Swedes have suffered many casualties, baggage, and a canon. Smilinski has proposed to bring 100,000 men to the Swedish cause, promising that they will be content with plunder rather than wages. The prince of Transylvania has offered the same. In Königsberg the city walls are being reinforced.

There are no tidings regarding the state of Latvia. The plague is spreading rapidly through upper Poland. A Turkish ambassador has arrived in Stettin. 600 Englishmen have arrived in Stade. The Imperial army is marching out of Silesia to support the Poles, and all farmers' horses there have been confiscated to pull the cannons.<sup>1</sup>

This was not particularly unusual.<sup>2</sup> Seventeenth-century newspapers could be puzzling and demanding: they did not present a coherent chronological narrative of events. Sometimes newspapers included lengthier narrative pieces, such as an ambassador's speech, a foreign ordinance or an account of a battle, but the majority of the newspaper was given over to a variety of divergent and often disconnected news stories, many only one or two lines long. Like the report in the Haegsche Weekelycke Mercurius above, the reader required a fairly firm understanding of the affairs at hand in order to grasp the report's meaning. Readers had to be familiar with commander Smilinski; with the location and importance of Stade (a small city a few miles from Hamburg); and the reason why the Imperial army would be marching towards Silesia to support the Poles. Little explanation, context or analysis was offered in the columns of the newspaper. Courantiers rarely offered discursive thoughts on the relative importance of particular news reports. There was generally little attempt to do things that would seem natural to journalists today, such as identifying the most important stories by giving them headlines or a more prominent place in the running order. The newspaper reader had to follow stories spread across several weeks or months in order to see them to conclusion—and even then a newspaper might cut short a story without further explanation.

By the end of the seventeenth century the fledgling newspaper reader could rely on special handbooks to assist them with their weekly newspaper. In 1692 the British historian Laurence Echard first published the Gazetteer's, or News-man's interpreter, a guidebook with an index of place names used in newspapers. A steady seller, Echard's guide went through seventeen editions in sixty years.<sup>3</sup> In 1732 the Staats- en Koeranten Tolk offered to Dutch readers a similar reference work, directly inspired by the popularity of the English Gazetteer.<sup>4</sup> We have already met Johann Hermann Knoop, the author of the Kort onderwys, hoedanig men de Couranten best lezen en gebruiken kan, the first Dutch handbook on newspaper reading, published in 1758.<sup>5</sup> Knoop considered the purpose of his guide to aid the “normal man, whether a peasant or a citizen, who cannot read and understand the newspaper the same as a lettered person, while many of them do wish to do so ....”<sup>6</sup> It is already significant that Knoop imagined citizens of relatively modest social standing, even country folk, as among the newspapers' clientele. This was a notable change since the earliest days of newspaper publication at the beginning of the seventeenth century.

While Knoop praised the newspaper as one of the most important sources of information for those wishing to remain in touch with current events, he acknowledged that newspaper reading could be complicated, and required some preparation. According to Knoop, the competent newspaper reader had to satisfy the following six conditions:

1. To be able to read
2. To understand the jargon of the newspaper

3. To know the location and importance of the most prominent towns and places mentioned in the newspaper
4. To read the newspaper regularly in order to understand it
5. Trust the writer or publisher of the newspaper
6. Pass rational judgement on the newspaper and evaluate its contents<sup>7</sup>

Knoop's conditions create a particular model of news consumption. The reader is presumed to be rational, critical and knowledgeable. Above all, the reader must follow the newspaper regularly, and must do so with tenacity. Enlightenment commentators like Knoop saw the newspaper as a sober tool of instruction and guidance, and its audience as inquisitive and attentive. But such presumptions are not wholly reflective of early modern readers and their interests. Newspapers were not only purchased for rational auto-didacticism; they could entertain or bore, provide bonding material in a coffeehouse or at the bourse, or be a means to achieve a higher social standing.

Reading the News

Scholars have recently begun to address the complicated task of reconstructing early modern reading habits and tastes. It is clear that there did not exist a single newspaper reading public with shared values or perceptions.<sup>8</sup> Joad Raymond, discussing English newsbooks of the 1640s, emphasises that "people of all literate classes" read news serials, and that readership was "socially and geographically diverse."<sup>9</sup> The high urban density of the Low Countries, especially in the Dutch Republic, stimulated the development of a highly politicised and literate society, certainly in comparison to other regions in Europe. It is estimated that by the middle of the seventeenth century around 60% of Dutch men and 40% of Dutch women could read.<sup>10</sup> Seventeenth-century commentators expressed wonder at the diversity of opinion circulating in the Dutch Republic and the political awareness of its citizenry. On 16 September 1666 Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht wrote in his Mercurius that "these days one hears many wondrous things everywhere, in carts and boats, [and] discussions of the present circumstances, and one can only admire the variety of opinions to be overheard."<sup>11</sup> That such discussions captured the imagination of the Dutch public is clear not least from the popular Dutch genre of dialogue-pamphlets: fictional political dialogues set in barges, taverns or houses, in which citizens from across the country debate the pressing issues of the day.<sup>12</sup> In a 1663 dialogue-pamphlet, one of the participants comments that "I used to know a curious person, who kept himself busy by travelling back and forth on the barge between Rotterdam and The Hague, in order to write up all the discussions and news exchanged on the barges."<sup>13</sup> Indeed, the character continued, in the barge "tongues are loose".

Newspapers seem to have played a considerable part in the daily political literature of many Dutch citizens. "Everyone reads them here", the French ambassador to the Dutch Republic, the Count of d'Avaux, sighed in the 1680s.<sup>14</sup> Marcel Broersma and Michiel van Groesen are likewise optimistic in their assessment of the scope of the audience for newspapers, ranging from the regent class to artisans and farmers.<sup>15</sup> How can we discover more about the readers of newspapers and their preferred reading practices? Scholars of early modern reading often turn to marginal annotations to study reactions, reading styles or provenance.<sup>16</sup> Sadly, Dutch and Flemish newspapers from the seventeenth century rarely feature extensive marginalia, unlike some English and Italian newspapers of the same period.<sup>17</sup> In most cases annotations are restricted to underlining or doodling; many newspapers were also used as scrap paper for financial calculations. If annotations are present then they are usually hostile. An issue of the Antwerp Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe of 28 June 1635, present in the Kungliga Biblioteket in Stockholm, was clearly perused by an unsatisfied Protestant reader (see ill. 6.1). They noted above the title that “Here one can see in abundance how the Catholic Spanish need to help themselves with lies when truth is in short supply.”<sup>18</sup> A copy of Abraham Verhoeven’s Courante uyt Duytschlandt in the same collection contains the note “Vide et ride mendacia Papistica” (Look and laugh at these Papist lies). A copy of the Opregte Leydse Courant in the university library in Ghent is twice annotated with the observation that reports in the newspaper were “untrue.”<sup>19</sup>

This, though extremely interesting, represents a relatively modest harvest of reader reactions; we are totally without examples of the sympathetic informed reader who responded directly to the reports in their paper by annotating their copy. Without such sources we must look elsewhere to learn more about the market for newspapers in the Dutch Republic. We can, in fact, learn much about the diversity of the audience for newspapers through a careful study of newspaper advertising.<sup>20</sup> As the Arn- hemsche Courant of 24 February 1864 stated, “Four or five columns of advertisements teach us more about the morals and habits of a society than ... a large book may.”<sup>21</sup> We are especially blessed by the fact that Dutch newspapers made precocious use of advertising from the early seventeenth century onwards. Every Dutch newspaper had a different advertising profile. Studying the quantity and variety of newspaper advertisements provides some indication of the presumed audience of seventeenth-century newspapers. After all, advertisers had to be confident enough of the circulation and readership of a newspaper in order to pay for the placement of an advertisement. This was a substantial fee: we know from the accounts of the early-eighteenth century Oprechte Haerlemse Courant that the average price of a standard advertisement of three lines was around 1.5 gulden.<sup>22</sup>

The first three decades of newspaper advertising were dominated by professionals in the book trade. The Amsterdam newsmen of the 1620s, 1630s and 1640s encouraged fellow printers and booksellers to notify colleagues and newspaper readers of their latest publications. Although it took around a decade for the practice to become truly popular, by 1645 the majority of active Dutch publishers had at some point advertised in an Amsterdam newspaper.<sup>23</sup> The Courante uyt Italien was the platform of choice for most booksellers, but the Tijdinghen uyt verscheide Quartieren and the two Tuesday weeklies, the Ordinarise Middelweeckse Courante and Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante were also patronised by a wide range of advertising booksellers. The only major paper which rarely featured advertisements was Mathijs van Meininga's Europische Courant—an indication that his tri-weekly was less popular with readers.<sup>24</sup> The overwhelming majority of books advertised were vernacular publications: bibles, psalters, almanacs, professional handbooks, emblem books, histories, news pamphlets and poetry. Large scholarly and Latin tomes were largely absent. The booksellers targeted a middling, vernacular readership in a competitive market for everyday literature.

In the 1650s and 1660s the advertising market diversified.<sup>25</sup> Booksellers continued to occupy a prominent position in the newspaper columns, but they were joined by numerous other professionals: Latin and French school masters, brokers, apothecaries, inventors, surgeons and postmasters all took space to advertise their services. Widows and heirs advertised the auction of libraries, art collections and the rarities and curiosities collected by their deceased relatives. These advertisements for goods and services competed for space with public announcements: notifications placed by municipal or regional authorities, or appeals for information or assistance from citizens spread throughout the country. Distraught parents appealed for information about lost children; others looked for friends who had set out on a journey but never arrived at their destination; yet others asked for information about a family member, enslaved for years on the North African coast. On 26 June 1655 an indignant citizen named Claes Jansz placed a notification in the Amsterdam Tijdinghen uyt verscheide Quartieren, complaining that someone had placed a public announcement in last week's Courante uyt Italien that Jansz had fled the city with 500 ducats.<sup>26</sup> This, Jansz asserted in the Tijdinghen, was certainly not true: he could be found on the Zeedijk if anyone wished to speak with him.

The increasing prominence of advertising and public announcements strengthened the role of newspapers in urban society. Advertisements provided a new reason to read newspapers, and they pulled in new readers. In addition to the goods and services they advertised, advertisements were an interesting source of domestic news. The plaintive appeals for help in the recovery of lost goods brought glimpses of everyday tragedies to which readers could themselves relate; certainly far more easily than the dense and repetitive reports of military manoeuvres on distant fields.

Professional readers also seem to have been highly suggestible. Once one school master or broker had placed an advertisement, others followed suit. While many advertisements for professional services, such as schooling, was aimed firmly at the upper tiers of Dutch society, we also find many public announcements from more humble readers of lesser means. On 5 February 1661 the family of Joost Jansz, a 24-year old shoemaker from East Frisia, announced in the Courante uyt Italien that Jansz had gone missing whilst travelling from Groningen to Amsterdam.<sup>27</sup> A year later, on 8 August 1662, the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante carried an appeal concerning a 13-year old boy from Schoonhoven, an apprentice pipe maker, who had run away from home.<sup>28</sup> From a study of these advertisements we can deduce that the Amsterdam and Haarlem papers were popular with a more diverse range of readers. The newspapers of Adriaen Vlacq and Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht in The Hague and Utrecht never featured as many advertisements and public announcements as those in Amsterdam or Haarlem, but those they do carry hint at a wealthier class of readers: announcements regarding the theft of expensive jewellery or the loss of bonds worth thousands of gulden are common.

At the end of the seventeenth century all four remaining Dutch newspapers had different advertising profiles (see fig. 6.1).<sup>29</sup> Undoubtedly, the leader in the market was the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant. Thanks to its decorous publisher, Abraham Casteleyn, the Haarlem tri-weekly had acquired a reputation as the paper of record in the Dutch Republic. By 1670 it was indisputably the most popular paper in the country. It had replaced the Amsterdam papers as the preferred advertising platform for the book trade. The majority of advertisements in the pages of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant related to the publication of books or advertised book auctions—mostly taking place in Leiden, Amsterdam and The Hague. Public announcements came in from across the country: if a child had gone missing in Leeuwarden or Zwolle, the best chance of finding them rested with the wide circulation of the Haarlem paper. The advertisers of the Amsterdamsche Courant, tri-weekly from 1673, were made up predominantly of a local clientele interested in a local audience. In the 1680s and 1690s the majority of advertisements in the Amsterdam paper concerned local commercial services and auctions in the city, rather than further afield. One could find information on the sale of tobacco, sugar, ships, timber, military equipment, canaries, estates, medicinal potions and playing cards. The Amsterdamsche Courant was the newspaper of choice of the professional and merchant class of Amsterdam. On average, the Amsterdamsche Courant featured more personal announcements than its Haarlem rival: amidst the hubbub of Amsterdam, it was easy for people and possessions to go missing.

The tri-weekly Opregte Leydse Courant, published from 1686, had a very different character. It played a considerable role in the Dutch book trade and market for book auctions, and was popular from its inception with many booksellers throughout the country. Yet it rarely featured public announcements from beyond Leiden and its immediate vicinity. The bi-weekly Utrechtse Courant was a true local paper. It was unable to attract many advertisers, and the majority of those who did take advertising space resided in Utrecht itself. Its circulation was clearly more restricted than that of its rivals.

It is clear that readers of seventeenth-century newspapers extended beyond what we may call “professional readers”: statesmen, administrators, news writers and merchants. Many readers turned to the news for pleasure or recreation. The philosopher Justus Lipsius, the school master David Beck and the writer P.C. Hooft often read the news for leisure. Reading was a social act which stemmed from the traditional common exchange and discussion of news.<sup>30</sup> To share news was standard decorum in early modern society. When a Florentine diplomat wrote to a colleague in Spain in 1605 he noted that: “I am sending Your Most Illustrious Lordship some page of avvisi that I found in the office of the secretariat that you will find useful for a bit of recreation”.<sup>31</sup> Hooft would read manuscript letters and newspapers to his guests in Muiden, satisfying “their ears with the taste of tidings.”<sup>32</sup> In 1746 there was a “Friendly Society of Neighbours” in Cambridgeshire which met each week to share and read news.<sup>33</sup> Other people read newspapers to find their own names. Bishop Petrus Codde (1648–1710) in Utrecht kept amongst his personal papers his copy of the Amsterdamsche Courant of 28 October 1688 where it mentioned that “This week Peter Codde of Amsterdam has been appointed as Bishop of Utrecht, news which has been awaited for two years”.<sup>34</sup> An issue of the same paper of 21 January 1676 was proudly preserved in the archive of the noble Van Weede family: the issue mentioned not one, but two members of the family by name in reports from Cologne and Brussels (see ill. 6.2).<sup>35</sup>

Newspapers had a variety of pedagogical uses. A 1658 tract published in Delft complained that the annual salary of a Reformed preacher (500 gulden) was far too low to sustain his household. The tract listed meticulously every single item which a preacher and his wife required throughout the year. This list included newspapers as an essential annual expense, alongside “books, paper, pens, and ink”.<sup>36</sup> A preacher might read the newspaper out of personal curiosity, but he could also, as the German Kaspar Stieler argued in his Zeitungs Lust und Nutz (The Pleasure and Utility of Newspapers), “incorporate material from the papers into his sermons”.<sup>37</sup> Newspapers were often the first source for contemporary histories and news digests.<sup>38</sup> Some readers bound together issues at the end of a year to create a chronicle of events, but there was also a market for pre-bound collections of newspapers. The 1670 stock catalogue of Gerard Ameling, bookseller in The Hague, listed “a pack of Tuesday and Thursday Haarlem newspapers from 1660 to 1669, complete”.<sup>39</sup> When Trijntje de Wit, a bookseller in Amsterdam, died in 1740, her stock inventory listed “80 volumes of newspapers”.<sup>40</sup> In the mid-eighteenth century, a paper merchant in Amsterdam advertised for “old newspapers, whether they are printed in Amsterdam, The Hague, Leiden, Haarlem, or elsewhere, from the years between 1680 and 1750 or from later or singular years”, which he promised to buy for a reasonable price.<sup>41</sup>

Newspapers could also be used in schools. By the mid-eighteenth century newspapers were used by Dutch school masters as class material.<sup>42</sup> Ephraim Chambers, in his Cyclopaedia (1728), wrote that “Vigneul de Marville recommends a set of Gazettes well wrote, as the fittest books for the instruction of young persons, coming into the world”.<sup>43</sup> In the early 1670s the wife of a skipper, Jannetje Jans, wrote proudly to her husband that “I wish to tell you that our daughter is already learning from the newspaper”.<sup>44</sup>

This letter from Jannetje Jans, documented by Judith Brouwer, strengthens the growing evidence that Dutch newspapers did not circulate exclusively in the domain of the political and mercantile elite.<sup>45</sup> Analysing a wealth of intercepted letters sent abroad from the Dutch Republic in 1672, Brouwer demonstrated that interest in political news was widely shared in Dutch society, including among individuals far removed from political decision-making. Wives and friends of merchants, skippers and artisans sent along copies of newspapers with their letters to the East Indies or Surinam. The drawings of the Haarlem artist Adriaen van Ostade, a specialist of homely tavern and workshop scenes, portray several newspaper readers in the act of reading.<sup>46</sup> Around 1673 Van Ostade captured not the wealthy regent with his weekly newspaper, but a weaver enjoying the same pleasure in his cottage (see ill. 6.3). Tavern scenes by Jan Steen and Cornelis Dusart from the same period also contain pictorial evidence of the circulation of newspapers in pub gatherings where they are perused by artisans similar to the weaver.

That is not to say, of course, that artisans like Van Ostade's weaver engaged with seventeenth-century newspapers with the same regularity or attentiveness as professional readers. The weaver in his cottage might have been reading an issue published a month ago. Readers had different styles and preferences of newspaper reading. This is clear from the diaries of David Beck and Jan de Boer, both meticulously analysed by Jeroen Blaak.<sup>47</sup> Beck was a school master teaching at the French school in The Hague in the 1610s and early 1620s, and he was provided with copies of Jan van Hilten's Courante uyt Italien by his uncle, who lived in Amsterdam.<sup>48</sup> When Beck travelled to Amsterdam he would visit Van Hilten's shop to buy an issue. It seems that Beck received the Courante on an irregular basis; he did not read the latest issue every week. Instead he read the newspaper for particular interesting accounts, or to follow a developing story in the West Indies or in the Thirty Years' War. Sometimes he read the entire newspaper, at other times it seems that he read only a particular story or report. With a salary of around 500 or 600 gulden a year, Beck was securely fixed in the middling echelons of urban society.<sup>49</sup> His friends and acquaintances included magistrates and delegates to the States General; he was well-versed in history and current affairs, and read widely. An annual subscription to an Amsterdam weekly would have cost Beck around half of one percent of his annual income: a weekly Amsterdam newspaper cost on average three gulden. He could clearly afford to read periodical news on a regular basis, but it remained a financial commitment.

The considerable price of an annual subscription imposed a natural barrier to the development of a mass readership in the seventeenth century. In Holland, one issue of a newspaper cost about the same as a litre of beer or half a kilo of rye bread, around a stuiver.<sup>50</sup> The cost of a Dutch newspaper was comparable to the cost of newspapers in the Habsburg Netherlands and the London Gazette.<sup>51</sup> The Paris Gazette and the Brussels Relations véritables were more expensive, costing around three times as much as the Dutch, Flemish and English periodicals.<sup>52</sup> The average price of Dutch newspapers would drop in the mid-eighteenth century, with most single issues priced around half a stuiver.<sup>53</sup> Newspaper publishers would, in any case, not have contemplated a true mass market, since the number of copies that could be pulled off the press in a day was itself limited by the capacities of the workmen and the number of presses available. Thus the range of customers and the potentialities of the technology achieved a rough equilibrium. Only the introduction of the steam press in the nineteenth century would permit a real step-change in circulation.

While many newspaper publishers throughout Europe encouraged all their readers to take out a subscription and to collect the issues together at the end of the year, this was by no means the preferred method of consumption of all customers. Beck did not feel the need to dedicate a large portion of his salary to a weekly paper. Most literate urban citizens in the Dutch Republic might be able to afford the occasional newspaper issue, but the cost of the annual subscription fee was too high for many of them. Some would follow the news only at times of the year when it particularly interested them, or when they had sufficient leisure to do it justice. A similar pattern is discerned by John Brewer, who demonstrated that the circulation of the London Public Advertiser between 1765 and 1771 dropped significantly outside of the parliamentary sessions.<sup>54</sup> The account books of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant of the early eighteenth century likewise demonstrate that many customers bought only the Saturday or Tuesday issue of the newspaper, rather than subscribing to a more expensive tri-weekly.<sup>55</sup>

While not as profitable to the publisher, who earned more through subscriptions, readers were happy to dip in and out of newspaper reading as suited them best. Publishers were forced to adopt strategies that accommodated these sorts of choices. Between 1689 and 1697, Jacob van Huysduynen in Leiden did not number his tri-weekly Oprechte Leydse Courant; each issue was, in this sense, a stand-alone publication.<sup>56</sup> If it was competing in the same market as news pamphlets and short histories, one issue of a newspaper was a relatively cheap investment. Accounts of the expenses of Lieuwe van Aitzema in The Hague in the 1650s show that most news pamphlets were purchased for anything between two and six stuivers a piece, depending on their length.<sup>57</sup> The newspaper, at one stuiver, was a comparative bargain.

When Beck read his occasional copies of the Courante in the early 1620s, the newspaper had been a fixture of Dutch society for less than a decade. There was little choice available in the Dutch Republic. But during the mid and late seventeenth century, Dutch readers enjoyed a much larger range of available titles, and newspapers could play a more significant part in their daily reading.

Readers were offered various ways of enjoying newspaper, to suit their purses and their preferences. During the 1650s and 1660s Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht published two concurrent newspapers in Utrecht: the bi-weekly Mercurius and the weekly Ordinaire Donderdaeghsche Europische Courant.<sup>58</sup> The first appeared on Mondays and Thursdays, and was interspersed with irregular topical news pamphlets. Van der Macht's second paper also rather curiously appeared on Thursdays. The Ordinaire Donderdaeghsche Europische Courant was published as a half-sheet folio, and contained a selection of reports published in the Thursday edition of the Mercurius, a full sheet quarto pamphlet which was filled with longer reports and always included the most recently arrived despatches. Van der Macht targeted two types of readers with these variant forms: a wealthier, professional reader for the Mercurius, and a more casual, less affluent reader for the Ordinaire Donderdaeghsche Europische Courant.

In 1674 the booksellers' guild in Groningen resolved to regulate the sale of newspapers in the city, establishing a set price to which all booksellers were required to adhere.<sup>59</sup> It was agreed that thirteen out of the eighteen booksellers in Groningen would sell newspapers: customers could buy one, two, three or four issues a week. Note that at this date there were no newspapers actually published in Groningen: in 1674 Dutch newspapers were published in Haarlem and Amsterdam (both tri-weekly on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays), and in The Hague (bi-weekly on Tuesdays and Thursdays). Evidently customers could choose a selection of the above; it is likely that the Groningen booksellers also began to sell issues of the bi-weekly Utrechtse Courant published from 1675 on Tuesdays and Fridays (and later Mondays and Fridays). Customers in Groningen could purchase two types of subscriptions. The first was a regular subscription, where one would pick up one's copy to take home, but one could also choose to read the newspaper in the bookshop. Reading in the bookshop was half the price, allowing one to read a newspaper for less than a stuiver per issue (see fig. 6.2).

The variety and quantity of news increased in the early eighteenth century. By the 1740s newspaper readers could choose from eight tri- or bi-weekly newspapers, published in Amsterdam, Haarlem, Leiden, The Hague, Utrecht, Delft, Rotterdam and Groningen. That some readers took advantage of this extensive range of choices is made clear from the diary of Jan de Boer, an eighteenth-century clerk living in Amsterdam. De Boer owned a library worth 200 gulden, and owned a second property worth 700 gulden, which he rented out.<sup>60</sup> De Boer was an avid news reader and chronicler: he kept an account of all noteworthy current affairs that he heard and read of, or otherwise witnessed himself. Around 16% of all news recorded in the diary of De Boer in the late 1740s and early 1750s was derived from newspapers.<sup>61</sup> He preserved many newspaper issues in the diary, especially when they contained long speeches or announcements.<sup>62</sup> He preferred the Amsterdamsche Courant and the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant, but also on occasion read newspapers from Leiden and The Hague.

De Boer came close to the ideal reader imagined by his contemporary Johann Hermann Knoop. He read regularly, and he did so with a critical eye, comparing reports of the same events in different newspapers. He subscribed to two tri-weekly papers, and bought specific issues of others when they contained an interesting ordinance, letter or news report. He read the newspaper largely for its foreign news; most of De Boer's knowledge of Dutch events was derived from his conversations with

Problematic Customers

Thousands of seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish newspapers survive outside the Low Countries. While men like David Beck and Jan de Boer made up much of the audience most newspapermen must have had in mind as they put together the text of their papers, newspapers reached another important audience that the courantiërs might not initially have reckoned with. Dutch and Flemish newspapers have been preserved in the archives of statesmen in Sweden, England, France, Germany, the Czech Republic and Russia. Often they were forwarded by merchants and diplomatic agents with their regular correspondence. Michel le Blon, agent of the Swedish crown in the 1630s, sent copies of both Saturday Amsterdam weeklies to his employers; sometimes he would also send copies of Arnhem or Antwerp newspapers, together with engravings, maps and pamphlets.<sup>64</sup> To the relatively humble bourgeois reader who scanned the Dutch newspapers one can thus add the names of more illustrious men: Duke August of Braunschweig-Lüneburg, Cardinal Mazarin, Chancellor Axel Oxenstierna and Sir Joseph Williamson.

Statesmen and diplomats read foreign newspapers because they believed both that newspapers reflected public opinion and that they possessed the authority to influence public opinion. Jason Peacey has demonstrated the extraordinary concern of English administrators and diplomats for the content of continental newspapers and news pamphlets.<sup>65</sup> Statesmen tried to influence the press abroad to promote the cause of their government and to maintain the reputation of their monarch. Newspapers were also pored over to ensure that policies or state secrets had not been leaked, and that diplomats or heads of state had not been defamed. Controlling the dissemination of news and managing the reputation of a state and its officers was not an easy task, but statesmen could employ a variety of tactics. Peacey has shown that diplomats often tried to court foreign newspaper publishers with favours.<sup>66</sup>

When a persuasive approach proved impossible, foreign rulers were quick to raise complaints. The Russian court in Moscow complained several times in the 1640s, 1650s and 1660s of the use of the title “grand prince” instead of “Tsar” when the Tsar was described in Dutch newspapers. The Russian court acted mainly through Dutch merchants in Russia, who complained to the burgomasters of Amsterdam and other towns, asking them to take action against the newspaper publishers.<sup>67</sup> Another complaint came in to the States of Holland on 18 December 1680: the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant of 12 September 1680 had, in its report on the marriage of the Tsar, denigrated the Tsar’s bride and the ceremony.<sup>68</sup>

The Oprechte Haerlemse Courant was subject of more scrutiny in January 1681, when the Swedish ambassador complained about a piece identifying the Swedish king’s principal advisors.<sup>69</sup> The Oprechte Rotterdamse Zee-en Post-tijdingen received two objections from England in July and September 1667 after publishing “insulting comments”.<sup>70</sup> The burgomasters of Cologne reserved particular derision for the Utrechtse Courant, which they criticised three times in the 1680s. The city of Lübeck did likewise in 1683.<sup>71</sup> These complaints did have a significant impact. Newspapers in the Dutch Republic were not subject to pre-publication approval (as was the case in the Southern Netherlands). Dutch authorities had little interest in censoring publications when complaints were not received.<sup>72</sup> Repeated criticism from abroad, especially at times of diplomatic tension, could motivate the regents to take action.

Scholars of the press have always emphasised the prominent role of the state in the censorship of the press. Most of Sautijn Kluit’s articles, written during the final decades of the nineteenth century, place the authorities in an adversarial relationship with the emerging newspapers; the two are opposing, hostile forces, jostling for control of the public sphere.<sup>73</sup> The research of Simon Groenveld, Guido de Bruin, Ingrid Weekhout and Donald Haks has reinforced this viewpoint.<sup>74</sup> According to this interpretation, a shift occurred in the use of repressive censorship in the second half of the seventeenth century. The number of edicts and persecutions against “seditious” books and pamphlets increased and financial punishment for convicted authors and booksellers increased tenfold during the course of the century. From the 1650s onwards newspapers were harassed by increasing scrutiny and prosecution.<sup>75</sup> From the 1670s, French gazettes published in the Dutch Republic were also frequently banned, so frequently, indeed, that on one occasion the French ambassador petitioned to have a title re-instated: apparently it was enjoyed at the French court, and now missed.<sup>76</sup> Of the forty-nine newspapers and serials included in this bibliography at least nineteen are known to have been pursued or banned by the authorities.

One should be careful, however, before assigning the statesmen of the Low Countries a role as the bogeymen of the press. While regents and political commentators were quick to deride “licentious” news reports, prosecution generally consisted of a stern warning rather than imprisonment or banishment.<sup>77</sup> Punishment was more often than not a symbolic mark of respect in response to the representations made by a foreign ambassador or head of state. Many sentences handed out to newspapermen were shortened, or not carried through at all. When the King of England, the Dutch William III, wrote to the Leiden burgomasters asking them to prohibit Jacob van Huysduynen from publishing his Oprechte Leydse Courant, they consented.<sup>78</sup> They banned Huysduynen in December 1693, but by June 1694 he was publishing once more. The bans and fines handed out to Crispijn Hoeckwater, Samuel Browne, Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht, the heirs of Broer Appelaer, Jacoba de Somere and Joannes Naer-anus were all reduced, or not in fact enforced.<sup>79</sup> When Sir George Downing, the English ambassador, complained to Jan de Witt in 1658 after the Amsterdam Courante uyt Italien included a scathing report on Oliver Cromwell’s funeral, De Witt paid little heed to the grievance, and the Amsterdam courantier suffered no punishment.<sup>80</sup>

The key figures at the heart of central and municipal government in the Dutch Republic appreciated the newspapers too much to enforce harsh sentences. Newspapers were regarded as a beneficial service to urban and commercial communities.<sup>81</sup> Statesmen continued to read newspapers with enthusiasm: from 1700 the States of Holland were sent each week thirty-nine copies of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant, thirty-one copies of the Oprechte Leydse Courant and twenty-eight copies of the Amsterdamsche Courant.<sup>82</sup> From the later 1630s onwards national and local authorities also began to use newspapers as tools of state communication. The States General, the States of Holland, the Admiralties and especially town councils placed ordinances, notifications and warnings in Dutch newspapers. The authorities announced the regulation of market days, the sale of naval prizes, the introduction of new canal barges and postal schedules, and warned their citizens of criminals and impostors. The state had gained confidence that the influence of the periodical on literate society was on the whole beneficial.<sup>83</sup>

Ultimately the greatest impact of the state on the production of newspapers was financial. In 1674 the States of Holland passed an ordinance which established a new tax on printed paper.<sup>84</sup> The ordinance targeted in particular “newspapers, gazettes and post-tidings”. It stipulated that all newspapers printed on both sides of a half sheet (described as “the usual manner”) were to be taxed at four penningen per copy. A tax collector was to demand the payment each week at the newspaper printer's shop.

This was an extraordinarily heavy tax. The new rate quadrupled the cost of paper to courantiërs, perhaps cutting their profits by half. Abraham Casteleyn in Haarlem was one of the first publishers to complain, before subverting the tax. He was duly investigated for tax evasion by the States of Holland with tedious regularity throughout the 1670s.<sup>85</sup> It is therefore not a surprise that demands for greater freedom of publication in the seventeenth century were not demands for editorial freedom, but for "books to be free" of excise.<sup>86</sup>

Alongside a regular tax, authorities throughout the Low Countries required ever-larger payments from newsmen for their privilege. The Enschedé family were required to pay 2,500 gulden to the Haarlem alms-house each year for their appointment as newspaper publishers in Haarlem in 1737.<sup>87</sup> Three years earlier the new courantiër in The Hague paid a lump sum of 6,600 gulden for his position.<sup>88</sup> In the Southern Netherlands Jan Meyer paid 8,000 gulden for the licence of the Gazette van Ghendt, while the new publisher of the French Gazette des Pays-Bas in Brussels paid 4,000 gulden in 1786.<sup>89</sup> In 1775 the new Antwerp courantiër paid only 600 gulden for a twelve-year privilege, a diminutive sum compared to some of his peers; yet even this seemed expensive in comparison to the meagre 6 gulden which Jan van Hilten and Broer Jansz had to pay for their licence to print a newspaper in Amsterdam in 1624.<sup>90</sup> Financial pressure, rather than political repression, was the true power of the state over the press.

A Dynamic Press

The seventeenth-century periodical press was a dynamic force. This has not always been the conventional perspective. Seventeenth-century newspapers have often been neglected or derided by scholars due to their lack of domestic reporting.<sup>91</sup> Digests of foreign news were at best considered a curious taste for citizens' use of their precious leisure time, at worst an organised distraction from affairs of state at home. If we use the modern press as a point of comparison for the seventeenth-century newspaper, these early papers resemble jumbled, confusing sheets of little political consequence. Without any notable qualitative development in the style or scope of reporting, the newspaper was an apolitical product, incapable of exciting its readers or influencing their decisions.

This narrative warrants serious reconsideration. Foreign news reports were by no means apolitical or of little consequence for the welfare of domestic political society or policy-making. The first newspapers published in the Low Countries emerged precisely because of the gravity contemporaries attached to foreign events. Chronicling the confessional and political struggle taking place in the Holy Roman Empire, newspapers were catapulted to the forefront of public imagination and concern. The constitutional crises which tore through the Dutch Republic in 1618–1619, 1650, 1672 and 1684 were all stimulated by changes in the European balance of power and the contested judgement of these changes among different groups within the Dutch Republic. Citizens across the Low Countries felt intimate connections with foreign communities and territories, through kinship, faith and politics. The struggle against the Ottomans or Barbary corsairs in the Balkans and the Mediterranean could excite the same joy or anguish as political victory at home. As Popkin so eloquently wrote, foreign news was "passionately exciting" to early modern readers:

They reached for these texts more avidly than many of the other eighteenth-century works we now find more fascinating. The words on paper in newspapers were words that made a difference: they were an important aspect of eighteenth-century reality itself, affecting the functioning of its political institutions and the outcome of movements as momentous as the major revolutions of the time.<sup>92</sup> tems of consent and communication. The newspaper very quickly found its voice, and its role, in political society. It complemented, a few times a week, the thoughts and considerations of its readers on the state of the world, drawing attention to the achievements and failures of its rulers, and generating interest in affairs of state. The newspaper offered to many readers a window into the realm of courts, kings and armies which had not previously been open to them.

Readers continued to enjoy a wide variety of news media alongside their newspaper. The newspaper was the product of a commercial market for news, in which various other media were already deeply imbedded. Manuscript newsletters, pamphlets, almanacs, histories and maps were flexible and overlapping commercial genres, and the newspaper was one further addition to this fluid culture. The news market would continue to diversify and expand after the arrival of the newspaper. From 1651 onwards the brother of Abraham Casteleyn, Pieter, published a hugely popular annual news review, the Hollandse Mercurius—a hundred years later rival annual reviews would compete for customers as vehemently as newspapers. By the end of the seventeenth century the Haegse Mercur, a satirical society journal, would likewise make its mark on Dutch news culture. Literary and scientific journals and political spectators (modelled on the famous English periodical of the same name) would become the great new vogues of eighteenth-century literary culture. Yet the newspaper was there to stay. The pioneers of the first age of the press—Abraham Verhoeven, Broer Jansz, the Van Hiltens, Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht, Nicolaes Jacobsz, Mathijs van Meininga and Abraham Casteleyn—had given the newspaper its form, and tempted their customers to return every week for more. The shape and content of the newspaper was not set in stone, and successive generations of newspaper readers could be invited to enjoy, or simply accommodate, new innovations. Every decade brought changes in news networks, the quantity of reports, typography, advertising and periodicity, and each courantier introduced his own tone. The survival of the newspaper is due to its diversification; its popularity assured by the continuous endeavour to surprise and satisfy readers with something new.

Chronological Register of Seventeenth-Century Dutch and Flemish Newspapers

The following register lists the forty-nine newspapers and news serials covered in this bibliography. The Dutch and Flemish newspapers are divided into separate sections. Each segment lists the standard title of the newspaper; the place of publication and (confirmed) dates of publication; the publishers, printers and sellers of the newspaper; the periodicity and days of publication; the format and pagination; and any other relevant information, such as suspensions, mergers, pseudonyms of publishers, or bibliographical anomalies. Full bibliographical details and introductions to the newspapers are found in part two; further details on the publishers, printers and sellers can also be found in Appendix D below.

Publication Days of Seventeenth-Century Dutch and Flemish Newspapers

The two following tables (figs. B.1 and B.2) list the publication days of seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish newspapers and the quantity of issues published on each day. Also listed are the total number of available issues each week and the number of towns where newspapers were printed.

The first table lists all issues published in the Dutch Republic between 1618 and 1700. The table does not include five Dutch news serials included in the bibliography, published in 1631, 1632, 1649, 1654 and 1666, because they did not have a regular day of publication. The second table lists all issues published in the Southern Netherlands between 1620 and 1700. The values given in both tables are based on evidence from extant newspaper issues and archival sources as described in the detailed bibliographical sections in part two.<sup>1</sup> These tables only record the publication of issues in years for which there is bibliographical or archival evidence that a newspaper was published.

In the following tables an asterisk implies that the publication of the newspaper issue on that day was not strict, and that the issue could appear on other days throughout the week. This was applicable in the Dutch Republic to the two first weekly Saturday newspapers, the Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c. and the Tijdinghen uyt verscheide Quartieren, up to 1624. Until the early 1640s, the newspapers published by Abraham Verhoeven, Martin Binnart and Willem Verdussen in Antwerp frequently appeared on different days of the week, and the number of issues published also fluctuated.

The two tables offer a general overview of the availability of Dutch and Flemish newspapers in the seventeenth-century Low Countries. In the first half of the seventeenth century the publication of Dutch and Flemish newspapers was restricted to only a few towns: Amsterdam, Arnhem, Delft, and (briefly) Utrecht in the north, and Antwerp and Bruges in the south. In the Dutch Republic the number of weekly issues increased rapidly during the 1630s and 1640s, most clustered around publication on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday. In the Southern Netherlands the Antwerp and Bruges newspapers settled on Tuesday and Friday as the preferred days of publication. In the 1650s and 1660s a variety of new titles emerged in the Dutch Republic, with publication spread out across the week. In 1666 one could find twelve different weekly issues in the Dutch Republic, printed in six towns on five days of the week. By the end of the seventeenth century Dutch newspapers only appeared in four cities, but these titles were exclusively tri- and bi-weekly. Together the four newspapers totalled eleven weekly issues, spread out across six days of publication. In the 1660s and early 1670s new Flemish newspapers emerged in Bruges, Ghent and Brussels: at least ten issues were published every week in 1673 and 1674. The Bruges and Antwerp papers appeared on Tuesday and Friday; the Ghent and Brussels papers on Monday and Thursday. By the 1680s the Bruges and Brussels newspapers had disappeared, leaving only two bi-weekly Flemish papers published in Antwerp and Ghent, with publication on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday.

Index of Printers, Publishers and Sellers of Newspapers

The following index lists all printers, publishers and sellers of seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish newspapers that I have been able to identify. The index is divided between the Dutch Republic and the Southern Netherlands, and individuals are listed alphabetically by surname. I have provided for each individual their full name (where known) and their lifespan or dates of activity; the location and dates of their activity in the newspaper trade; their roles in the newspaper trade and the associated newspapers; and any familial relation to other individuals in the newspaper trade.

I have used a variety of sources to compose this index. The newspapers themselves naturally offer plenty of information, but our knowledge of many newspapermen can be enhanced using archival sources. This is especially pertinent to the identification of widows and heirs of newspaper publishers, many of whom often maintained the name of the male founder on the newspaper. More detailed information on each individual and sources related to their careers can be found in the relevant newspaper introductions in part two.

In total the index contains ninety-one individuals: sixty-five from the Dutch Republic and twenty-six from the Southern Netherlands. Seventy-two are men and nineteen women. All women involved in the newspaper trade inherited the position from their husband or parents, but many continued the venture for the remainder of their lives. The publication of a newspaper was a true family affair: fifty-three individuals in this list had a close relative involved in the newspaper trade. Most of those involved in the trade in the Southern Netherlands were members of four families of courantiers: the Verhovens, Verdussens and Binnarts in Antwerp, and the Graets in Ghent.

Most of those listed here were printer-publishers. Towards the end of the seventeenth century the distinction between printer and publisher became more pronounced, but some publishers, such as the Van Hiltens or Adriaen Leenaertsz, already delegated the printing of their newspaper to others in the 1610s and 1620s. In the seventeenth century the newspaper publisher was often also the editor or writer of the newspaper. This gradually changed during the eighteenth century, when many publishers employed a writer to compose the newspaper. This may also have been the case towards the end of the seventeenth century, but I have been unable to identify any newspaper editors who were not publishers. The thirteen newspaper vendors listed below are known as specific distributors of a newspaper from advertisements or imprint statements in the newspaper, or from archival sources.

Places of Correspondence in Seventeenth-Century Dutch and Flemish Newspapers

Seventeenth-century newspapers were composed of a carefully arranged sequence of news reports. These reports were generally not presented under a heading describing the content of the report, but were presented under a simple description of its geographical origin and date. These datelines reveal where news was compiled and gathered; and they can expose the international news networks of newspaper publishers.<sup>1</sup> Datelines do not necessarily reveal the content of a news report: a report from London may include news from the city itself, or news from Scotland, France, Spain or the Americas. More often than not a single datelined report contains a variety of news bulletins and stories concerning events in different geographical locations.

The 16,232 surviving issues documented in this bibliography include over 240,000 reports from more than 3,400 identifiable cities and towns in Europe, Africa, Asia and the Americas. The ten most prominent places of correspondence—The Hague, London, Paris, Amsterdam, Vienna, Brussels, Cologne, Hamburg, Venice and Rome—account for almost half the total number of reports. In contrast, more than 1,600 towns appear only once, and around 750 towns only appear twice. Overall, as can be seen from figure E.1, the top one hundred places of correspondence account for around 88 % of all reports. In this respect the international news network was more fixed than may appear from the vast miscellany of places, large and small, that crop up from time to time. Deciphering the locations and modern English spelling of many of these places has often proved challenging, today as in the seventeenth century. Early modern newspaper readers required atlases and handbooks to find their way around the pages of their weekly issues. Laurence Echard, the author of the highly successful Gazetteer's, or News-man's interpreter (first published in 1692), which provided a detailed description of places of correspondence found in newspapers, apologised in his preface that

The reader is not to expect to find every little place that is sometimes mentioned in the gazettes and news-books, for that would be a work of vast difficulty, and little use, there being often some places named no better than villages, which are never mentioned twice ...<sup>2</sup>

Despite the difficulties of locating the sites of seventeenth-century skirmishes in Silesia, Serbia or Savoy, the documentation and analysis of places of correspondences remains a worthwhile exercise. The newspaper introductions offered in part two contain detailed analyses of the news networks of particular titles, and the diversity of reports offered to their readers. In this appendix I wish to offer some more general statistics on places of correspondence, bringing together the entire corpus of surviving Netherlandish newspaper issues. Below are provided seventeen tables listing places of correspondence in seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish newspapers, together with six maps (figs. E.1–23). The first table offers general statistics concerning the 1,255 places of correspondence found at least three times in surviving newspapers. The second table offers the hundred most prominent places of correspondence found in the newspapers described in this bibliography. The following fifteen tables list all places of correspondence found at least three times in specific countries or regions.

The statistics should be interpreted with care. They are skewed towards the second half of the seventeenth century due to the far greater quantity of surviving issues of this period; and especially towards the tri-weekly Oprechte Haerlemse Courant and Amsterdamsche Courant, which have survived in near-complete runs from 1665 and 1684 respectively. These two titles make up the majority of the corpus and contain a larger number of reports than some of their competitors and predecessors. The survival of other titles, such as the Utrechtse Courant, the Haegse Post-Tydingen, or the Utrecht Mercurius is much more patchy. The survival of Flemish newspapers is especially poor, and the places of correspondence found in their pages have limited impact on these total statistics. Nevertheless, the accumulated total can provide a generalised portrait of the most important news centres to newspapers printed in the Low Countries.

The hundred most prominent places of correspondence are spread far and wide across Europe. The great commercial and political centres of the Holy Roman Empire and the Low Countries account for many of them, together with the capitals and most prominent cities of France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, the British Isles, Sweden, Denmark and Poland. Many cities in this ranking, like Cologne, Venice, Rome and Paris, were crucial news gathering hubs of the international European postal networks; they are prominent places of correspondence in newspapers published throughout Europe. But there are some surprises too: the news networks of seventeenth-century Dutch newspaper publishers had a distinct northern European centre of gravity. Comparing the ranking of the newspapers in this bibliography to the sixteenth-century manuscript Fuggerzeitungen collected in Vienna, there are some remarkable differences.<sup>3</sup> Lyon, one of the most prominent centres of news dissemination in the Fuggerzeitungen, is ranked eighty-fourth here—below towns like Riga, Holstein, Deal and Falmouth. Northern European political and commercial centres which rarely featured in the manuscript newsletters, such as London, Amsterdam, The Hague, Copenhagen, Berlin, Danzig, Helsingør, Warsaw and Edinburgh became staples of the news trade in the second half of the seventeenth century, and dominate the pages of Dutch newspapers. Antwerp, the great northern postal centre of the sixteenth century, is gradually bypassed as a news hub as direct routes between the Dutch Republic and England are established; Brussels and Ghent, local competitors of Antwerp, rise in prominence in the same period, and are responsible for a higher proportion of reports from the Southern Netherlands found in Dutch newspapers.

The Holy Roman Empire provided the most diverse range of reports: close to 500 places of correspondence in the region appeared at least three times in surviving Dutch and Flemish newspapers. This is due to the intensity of warfare during the Thirty Years' War and the wars of Louis XIV; the Empire's proximity to the Low Countries; and the importance of postal connections between the two regions. Reading audiences in the Dutch Republic and the Southern Netherlands followed closely every military manoeuvre in the Holy Roman Empire. Every twist and turn in the Empire's fortunes reverberated in the Low Countries: it was essential to follow the latest skirmishes from an unfamiliar village in Saxony or fortress in Bohemia. The Low Countries too provide a wide range of places of correspondence, mostly composed of large commercial centres and strategic border towns. During the campaigning season Dutch and Flemish newspapers featured a regular stream of reports from towns and fortresses along the Rhine basin and the Southern Netherlands—here the proximity of the battlefield and the more familiar knowledge of the region will have played its part in delivering datelined news from smaller towns and villages.

News from England and France was often channelled through London and Paris respectively. Both cities outnumber the second ranked city in their country by over 11,000 reports. Yet from the 1640s Dutch and Flemish newspapers increasingly featured reports from a range of English maritime centres (especially Plymouth, Portsmouth and Falmouth), as well as reports from Edinburgh and Dublin. In France news from the battlefields in the northern lowlands of Picardy and Artois and the southern hills of Roussillon contributed a broad range of places of correspondence too; together with great ports like Bordeaux, Marseille and La Rochelle.

Small towns or villages located in the Italian or Iberian Peninsulas were rarely credited in the datelines of Dutch and Flemish newspapers. Reports were restricted to a small number of prominent commercial cities and ports: Venice, Rome, Milan, Genoa, Turin, Naples and Livorno in Italy; Madrid, Cádiz, and to a lesser extent Alicante, Málaga, Bilbao and San Sebastian in Spain; and Lisbon in Portugal. The Mediterranean and Eastern European news theatres provided a scattering of datelines. The Ottoman court was ever present in the minds of Europe's rulers; most news from the Eastern Mediterranean and the Balkans was datelined under reports from Venice, but towards the end of the seventeenth century it became more common to present such news under a dateline from Constantinople. The trading centre of Smyrna, on the western coast of Anatolia, also appears with regularity towards the end of the century. The North African coast provided frequent reports on the struggles of European powers against the Barbary slavers in Algiers, Tripoli, Salé and Tunis; and reports from Greece, Crete and Xante highlighted the persistent Venetian struggle against the Ottoman Empire. When Habsburg armies advanced successfully into the Balkans in the 1680s and 1690s reports from small Balkan fortresses became a real speciality of Dutch newspapers, and became a regular addition to the weekly pages.

Datelined reports from the Atlantic World or the Far East were extremely rare. News from Brazil, the Caribbean or the East Indies was often presented under domestic news headings. Only on special occasions (and most commonly towards the end of the century) did newspaper publishers credit New York or the Cape of Good Hope with a dateline. When they did so, they acknowledged a distant world coming ever closer.

Four Newspaper Translations

Below follow English translations of four seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish newspapers. These are presented to offer the reader a sense of the content, style and tone of the seventeenth-century newspapers treated in the present work. Two are winter issues; the others give a flavour of the busier summer months, once the campaigning season is underway, with much news of troop movements and some important military engagements.

The newspapers were chosen from four different titles, representing different time periods and styles of reporting. The first is an issue of Abraham Verhoeven's Nieuwe Tijdinghen, published on Saturday 25 February 1623 in Antwerp. The issue highlights the general plight of German towns, farmers and citizens in the opening phase of the Thirty Years' War, and details the aftermath of the Imperial conquest of the Palatinate, including the transportation of the Heidelberg library to Rome. It also contains one of Verhoeven's typical advertisements for a forthcoming publication.

The second newspaper is an issue of Broer Jansz's Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, published on Saturday 11 June 1633 in Amsterdam. This issue deals with the effects of the Swedish entry into Thirty Years' War, and follows the successes of the Protestant cause in the Holy Roman Empire. It also reports the Spanish surrender at Rheinberg, a crucial fortress along the Rhine taken successively by the Dutch and Spanish on multiple occasions during Eighty Years' War.

The third newspaper is an issue of Crispijn Hoeckwater's Haegse Post-Tydingen, published on Tuesday 25 March 1670 in The Hague. This issue covers, amongst other topics, the uncertainty surrounding the election of the Pope; the aftermath of Venetian defeat in Crete; warfare in Eastern Poland; and the daily business of diplomatic comings and goings in The Hague.

The fourth newspaper is an issue of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant, published on Saturday 14 June 1692 in Haarlem. This issue documents the French bombardment of Oneglia; the aftermath of the allied Anglo-Dutch victory at the naval battles of Cherbourg and La Hougue; the French capture of Namur; and it anticipates the battle of Steenkerque fought between France and the allied Anglo-Dutch coalition on 3 August. This issue survives in two variant editions: I have translated the edition (surviving in the Noord-Hollands Archief) with late coming news reports from Liège and Spain, and three fewer advertisements.

The second, third and fourth newspapers were printed in double columns; Verhoeven's Nieuwe Tijdinghen were printed in one column. Titles and headings are italicised or in full capitals only when given as such.

February, 1623. 22.

New

Tidings from Germany, from Vienna in Austria.

With tidings from the Palatinate.<sup>1</sup>

First printed 25 February.

At Antwerp, with Abraham Verhoeven, on the Lombardenvest in the Golden Sun.

Tidings from Germany, from Vienna in Austria.

Due to the poverty and famine all around here the authorities have proclaimed and affixed placards in all corners and notable locations of the city, which prohibit the sale of goods before market times, and establish maximum prices for cheese, butter, wheat, wine, beer, barley, honey, wax, fish, meat, candles, soap, cloth, timber, leather, starch, coal, etc. Any transgressors of the placard will have their goods confiscated and their citizenship withdrawn or exemptions annulled, and will be pilloried on the market.

Furthermore the Turks continue to plunder and steal along the Canishan [Slovenian-Hungarian] borders; Gabriel Bethlen buys a great deal of jewellery and clothing for his mistress; and here there is expected a noble lady or countess from Poland.

Tidings from Erfurt, 26 January.

The Saxon recruits from Oldenburg are still garrisoned in villages around Erfurt. After having robbed all the farmers they have now begun to molest the churches, stealing chalices and ornaments; they wish to move to the Electorate of Mainz, which will cause the lands of Thuringia to suffer greatly.

Tidings from Prague.

On 16 January a military officer undertook to take his company onto the streets to behave like knaves and bandits, and to torment and rob the citizens of this town, and this the officer did, but he was caught, and shortly afterwards hanged, in his best clothes, from the gallows along the road outside the city.

Tidings from Regensburg, 25 January.

On the 18th of this month the Brandenburg envoys arrived here, and had an audience with the Emperor the other day.

As we had related in our latest letters that the Saxon envoy was murdered by his own servant, so we can now relate that the murderer was executed on Thursday, two days after the murder. He was placed on a scaffold in front of the city hall, where his right hand was chopped off, and afterwards he was decapitated, and his head and hand were placed on a pike on the tower bridge; but as an act of exceptional grace his body was given a burial.

On the 24th of this month another assembly was held in this city. And in the Vogtland ten or twelve wolves are coming down into the villages and causing many casualties and much damage.

In the Palatinate-Neuburg the value of the coinage has been altered, and the Rijksdaalder is now valued at 18 Batzen, the Bavarian at 12 Batzen, and the 9 Kreuzer at 6 Batzen and 10 penningen; now that this has been changed there is plenty of food to be bought.

Tidings from Speyer.

The cavalry in Franconia are causing much damage with their raids; they arrive daily here at Speyer and encamp before the city, and despite the neutrality of his Princely Grace of Speyer they abduct farmers from the surrounding villages and demand ransom for their return; but here they are attempting to raise more cavalry from the Imperial army in order to defend themselves against the raiders.

Here in Speyer five companies of Holstein cavalry will be recruited, some of whom have already arrived in the city.

Tidings from Bergstrasse.

The land of Bergstrasse is now once more populated with many artisans, who richly reward the region with their trade.

Otherwise there are very uncertain conditions for travel here in the Bergstrasse because many soldiers confiscate goods and belongings; indeed the citizens or farmers who bring their grain to the mill find all their grain taken by hungry soldiers, which causes many people to suffer from hunger.

Here we have information that Don Guillermo Verdugo will become governor of the Palatinate.

And at Heidelberg the great wine barrel is being dismantled and prepared for transportation, but to whom it will be given is not yet certain, and will be related soon.

And here it is also ordered that the Catholic Apostolic Roman religion will be implemented and observed, and that the Calvinists are to depart from the city, but some of them are trying to stay, for which they will have to pay large fees.

Furthermore all the books from the library at Heidelberg have been packed in white barrels, and it is understood that they are to be transported to Rome, or that they are already underway.

From Osnabrück it is understood that several thousand troops of the Duke of Bavaria have already arrived in the same region, and that the troops of the Duke of Saxony are also expected, composed of 1,000 cavalry and 5,000 infantry.

Furthermore the reader will soon be presented in both Latin and Dutch with the Imperial proposition delivered at the Reichstag in Regensburg, which portrays the current state of the Holy Roman Empire, and into what fear and danger the Empire was plunged by Frederick of the Palatinate and the latest war in Germany, and why the same Frederick has therefore been outlawed and will never be permitted to rule over his Electorate again, etc.

THE END.

V.C.D.W.C.A. [Vidit Cornelis de
Witte, Canonicus Antverpiensis]

Tidings from various Quarters, 1633. No. 24.<sup>2</sup>

From Rome, 19 May 1633.

A few days ago, when the foundations of the castle of St Angelo were being fortified, a copper case was found there filled with coins minted in the era of Alaric and other Gothic kings, the ancestors of the Swedes. Various literati are trying to find an explanation concerning this discovery.

The Duke of Mercoeur and the Prince of Martignes arrived this morning from Naples, and were well received. They have now taking their leave from the Pope, and are due to return to France.

From Venice, 18 May.

The Duke of Parma made a serious complaint to the governor of Milan regarding the violence of Spanish soldiers, who have plundered and burnt many villages belonging to Parma on the frontiers of Milan. But the Spanish governor ignores these complaints. It is also certain that almost all nobles in Milan have tried to convince the governor that he should be responsible for the maintenance of the troops, and that the nobles are willing to provide a portion of their income for that purpose. The nobles have tried to publicise their proposal, but the governor wishes to hear none of it.

From Genoa, 16 ditto.

The great apprehension in this city concerning the arrival of the brother of the King of Spain has changed to generous compassion now that he has arrived, given his peaceful nature. The citizens here are most pleased to be rid of this anxiety, and that they can now leave at home the weapons which they used to carry around with them, and which have caused much sorrow.

From Danzig, 18 ditto.

The Poles in the service of the Emperor in Silesia have all started to return back home, and most of them are wounded and in a disappointed state, except for those who met the Spanish ambassador and his servants on the road, whom they robbed down to his undershirt, and exchanged clothes. These Poles are now strutting around, dressed in Spanish wear.

From Augsburg, 17 ditto.

The armies of field marshal Horn and Duke Bernhard of Weimar have arrived at Donauwörth, and it seems that they will try to besiege Rain. The Bavarian army, consisting of 200 companies and some dragoons, has reached the bridge at Regensburg; whether they will now dare to turn and face the Swedes, time will tell.

From Breslau, 14 ditto.

Last Wednesday everything was transported to Strelen and the army, which is now 30,000 men strong, made a rendezvous; the same day the march to Neisse began, where the Imperial troops have built up a considerable store of victuals, and have received many reinforcements from Bohemia. Yesterday seven 52-pounders and one 24-pounder were transported from here to the army. The Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg have sent commander Backersdorp over here, and wish to appropriate the Imperial toll for their own income; they also demand supplies from this city for their army.

On the river Oder the sieges of Głogów, Ścinawa, Brzeg and Opole continue. News arrived that the young Prince of Denmark has marched with the Brandenburg and Daubische regiments for Ziębice, that he met many Slavs at Warta, whom he caused to flee, taking their standards and killing many of them.

From Hof, 22 ditto.

Yesterday Commander Dubald encountered and defeated the regiments of commander Flopski, commander Kegelwitzen and the new Hungarian troops, stationed at Wilbach and the surrounding villages, half a mile from Eger, and killed 400 Slavs, and took many prisoners. The prisoners say that commander Holcken was five miles from Eger three days ago, with the instruction of General Friedland to march against the army of Duke Wilhelm of Weimar.

Tidings have arrived from Breslau that on the 20th of this month seven Imperial regiments charged the young Prince of Denmark, but that he had suffered few casualties, and was supported by commander Kalckensteyn and the Altenburg regiment, and caused the Imperial troops to flee, and marched furiously towards the river Neisse.

From Rheinhausen, 31 ditto.

On the 29th of this month the Hagenauers, namely Stadhouder Metternich and the Count of Salm, departed early in the morning to travel from Philippsburg to Haguenau; but this morning we have received tidings that commander Rantzou encountered them at Lauterbourg, and beat and dispersed them.

Last Friday some Imperial troops plundered a Strasbourg ship (looking to sail up via Frankfurt), dividing the best goods between them and throwing the rest into the water.

The fortress at Heidelberg is resilient but given the ferocity of the siege it seems that the defenders will not be able to hold out much longer.

From Ladenburg, 4 June.

Those in the fortress of Heidelberg have surrendered, and are retreating with their belongings according to military custom, and are convoyed towards the Rhine, while 300 German soldiers have signed up for service [with the besieging forces].

From the army before Rheinberg, 6 June.

Those in the city saw our troops approach courageously every day and night; the governor inside knew that they would have to use the old gunpowder in the city, which they cannot trust, so the captains of the city, including those of the entrenchments, held a war council to deliberate, and fearing that they will be overrun (for the lack of gunpowder), decided to surrender, and on the evening of 1 June sent representatives to our army, where the conditions of surrender were agreed upon. It was agreed that the governor would retreat with all military personnel from the city and fortress of Rheinberg on Saturday 4 June, and that His Excellency would on Thursday afternoon be allowed to station a garrison in the gate of the city and some of the sconces,<sup>3</sup> in order to observe the retreat with his troops. On Thursday evening seven of our companies marched for the city, including the guard of the illustrious Prince, who lodged in the city gate, and six other companies in the sconces and entrenchments.

Those of the city began to depart from 7 am on Saturday morning. First 262 wagons departed with women and children, together with the governor's wife in a carriage. Then came twenty-six standards of infantry, around 1,300–1,400 men, with two cannon, each pulled by nine horses. Then followed a cavalry company, around eighty horses strong. Then came the governor, an old man, accompanied by seven horses. Thereafter a good number of our soldiers invested the city, and Colonel Wijnbergen was appointed commander. The articles of surrender have been printed, and are to be found everywhere. On the same Saturday the Reformed community gathered for a sermon and a service of thanksgiving in the large church.

Here they are now occupied with the repair of the city, and fortifying all around, including the sconces outside the city and the sconce across the Rhine. The pontoons and ships of the enemy were left behind, which was a great loss to them. Inside the city and sconces thirty-three pieces of ordnance were found, including three 24-pounders, and seven iron pieces.

Those of Antwerp published last week that the Prince of Orange was encamped around Rheinberg, not wishing to relate that the city was actually besieged, in order to keep their citizens calm, but this week the citizens are surely informed, given the many festivities and triumphal salvos fired from the sconces and nearby towns.

On Sacraments day [the feast of Corpus Christi] we laboured all day on the sloops, in order to equip them properly. On four sloops we found fourteen pieces of ordnance each, adorned with red drapery, and atop the mast there was a blood red flag; four similar sloops are expected here from Brussels on the 7th of this month; and two sloops were also ready at the cross-sconce, and another two new sloops, each with four pieces of ordnance, and another nine small, old sloops which they equipped; and there eighteen new sloops are still expected on 1 July, from Mechelen and Brussels. It is clear that the Spanish admiral will try to do something, but we will keep a close eye on his arrival.

Our pontoons, sloops and ships are prepared and ready to sail, and now that crews have been recruited they are to sail for Zeeland.

His Grace Count William, still with a few regiments on the Hemertse Waard, has sent a few companies to Willemstad, Klundert and other places around there.

Those of Hulst are digging a new canal from Absdale to the Moervaart.

It seems that the enemy had a plan to do something around the river Scheldt, for on 1 June seven of her largest sloops and a galley arrived at the fortress Peerle, but retreated quietly during the night of 2 June.

Our people are labouring efficiently on the fortifications of fortress Sint-Anna in the Polder van Namen, where many supplies have been sent with wagons. Many Italians are deserting daily from Hulst, complaining that they have not received any wages and are suffering great poverty, receiving nothing more than dry bread; these Italians are all shipped to Zeeland, or down river.

The 180 Englishmen serving on the Spanish side and captured by our frigates at sea have been released, except for the officers, who are held in Vlissingen.

Our privateers have once again captured and brought in rich bounties.

At Vlissingen two ships have arrived from Brazil carrying 880 cases of sugar, and some tobacco and sweet fruits.

This week representatives from both sides continued negotiations in The Hague. May God grant us the best result.

The enemy continues to construct two sconces on the river Meuse, notwithstanding incredible hunger and shortages. All our ships in the north have been kept in port, which makes it seem that our prince has great plans.

Printed in Amsterdam, by Broer Jansz (former courantier in the army of His Princely Excellency) living on the Nieuwezijds Achterburgwal, in the Silver Can, next to brewery the Haystack. 11 June, Anno 1633.

Tuesday's Post-tidings from The Hague. N. 23.<sup>4</sup>

SPAIN.

Madrid, 26 February. The King is daily entertained by his regiment of guards. Thus far it is understood that no final resolution has been agreed upon concerning the commander of the cavalry to be sent to the Southern Netherlands. Don Diego de Spinoza will depart on the first of the forthcoming week for the Southern Netherlands, in order to take up his position in that region to which the Queen Regent has appointed him. At the same time the lord Molina prepares himself to reside at the court of France as envoy. Prince Don Jean maintains himself at Zaragoza, and has good relations these days with the potentates of the kingdom. Here there is daily expected the results of the election of the Pope, for which those of France labour greatly, trying their best to have one of theirs appointed, but for many reasons it seems that a Roman will in the end be chosen.

ITALY.

Rome, 28 February. The election remains uncertain. Cardinal Vidonni, the great favourite of Chigi, has lost his esteem with the population after many pasquilles have been disseminated, which motivated some people to post a satirical effigy of him on the square of the conclave; meanwhile Cardinal Antonio is dying, preparing himself for his passage to the next world. Last Sunday the Earl of Northumberland gave an expensive feast, at which the Constable Colonna, the Count of Nevers and many lords of quality and many notable ladies were entertained.

Rome, 1 March. The return of the French messenger is expected, who will carry a response regarding the consent of the French crown in favour of the appointment of Cardinal Chigi as Pope; meanwhile there are rumours here of a large but secret faction of Cardinals of whom it is assumed that they will continue to reject any resolutions for a long time. A statue of Cardinal François Barbarin has been placed in the Pauline chapel in the conclave, where there are many attendants of the conclave and friends of cardinals who pray two hours a day for the speedy and happy resolution of the election. The Cardinals Nerly and Palavicini are still indisposed, but Cardinal St Croix seems to have reconciled himself. The Spanish ambassador has entertained several lords to a magnificent lunch, and afterwards held a lengthy discussion. Here there is word of a wedding between the brother of the Count of Nevers and the Princess Rossano, which would take place after the election.

Venice, 5 March. There is advice from Dalmatia that the Morlachs [Croats or Serbs], who recently lost many of their cattle to the Turks, decided not to wait for the promised compensation, and raided deep into Ottoman territory, and took many more cattle than they had lost in the first place; meanwhile the Pasha of Bosnia captured three of the bandits and punished them severely. These days there arrived here some envoys from Possidaria, seconded by the other provinces belonging to the republic of Venice. Meanwhile two Marseille ships with various supplies have been sent to the inhabitants of Perasto. Last week the lord Hirolamo Pisaro, former quartermaster of the navy and general of the galleys, was appointed extraordinary quartermaster; and given his excellent and praiseworthy conduct in his former position, there is confidence that he will pursue a successful policy concerning the business of the fortress of Heraklion. It has been resolved that the miraculous statue of the Holy Virgin, which has thus far stood in the church of St Tite in Heraklion, will be dismantled, and will be re-erected in this city [Venice] with due ceremony. The sale of public offices for the financing of the war will now cease, and all offices will henceforth be distributed to persons of merit. Last Monday night the galley Arbesano departed from the city with the Princess Trivulse, who ordered special silverware for the journey with which she entertained the captain of the galley. The Dutch who have enjoyed a stay at our lido have departed for their journey home. Lord Giuglio Querini, former governor of Tine arrived in the ship de vergulde Valck from Xante, together with the lord Natal Durdo and other great men who served in Crete, who have brought the news that there were disagreements amongst the Turks regarding the distribution of estates [on Crete]; most of the Turks claimed estates on the grounds of merit, but were punished by the vizier, and the Ottoman fleet has been ordered to depart on 1 May to assist in the governance of the island against various mutineers. It may also be possible that the fleet has been ordered there by the Sultan to serve in an attempt on Malta. In Heraklion all armaments and ammunition of the city have been burnt in the church of Catherine. It is said that in the storms of the last few days more than eighteen ships and 4,800 men have been lost.

POLAND and PRUSSIA.

Warsaw, 28 February. The confused spirits surrounding the marriage of the King have been tempered, and the marriage has now finally gone through, despite the many intrigues of the French, who have spent contemptibly large sums in order to prevent it. Meanwhile there is great alarm here about the invasion of the Turks and the rebel Cossacks in the Ukraine.

Warsaw, 28 February. Yesterday news arrived from Czenstochowa that the royal copulation must have occurred on the 27th of this month, after the royal bride arrived on the 26th, as the king is shortly expected at the Reichstag. Everything is most confused in the Ukraine, and the Cossack envoys, including Captain Viersabousky, who have recently been in this state with their baggage train, have been robbed by Tartars of all their papers and letters; these letters revealed that the Cossacks pursued a two-faced diplomacy, and sought to declare for the Turkish Sultan, which caused them all to be cut down by the sword, save for two boys; but they too were caught and found their deserved punishment when the loyal Sierko and his troops ran them down, leaving behind several thousand Cossack prisoners, including women and children. 300 Tartars were also left on the field; after this Dorosensko called for an assembly, which agreed to declare for our Royal Majesty and to throw off the Turkish yoke; which caused the Turks to despatch immediately new envoys to Poland. This new declaration [by the Tartars] did not suit Dorosensko at all, for he tried with cunning to keep his people under the Turkish yoke and to keep them there, which has not worked, for the people realised that it suited them much better to become good Poles again, after having tried the Turkish yoke. The commissaries of this [Polish] crown are still in Muscovy, and although the negotiations are moving slowly, the Czar wants to conclude an alliance with the Poles, and is waiting only to see to what extent this [Polish] crown will ally with the house of Austria.

GERMANY, and the neighbouring states.

Vienna, 4 March. On the orders of the Emperor 17,000 infantry and 8,000 cavalry will be recruited, and a few new regiments will be ordained. News from upper Hungary confirms the death of the Hungarians Botzkay and Binerti, which caused prominent factions of Protestants to be most enraged; therefore Count Nadasti and Baron Zittkery, representatives of his Imperial Majesty in the assembly in Hungary, have not been able to fulfil their commission; it seems that the general mood is now improved. One of these days there will be an assembly of the greats of Hungary in Bratislava.

Lower river Elbe, 8 March. Now the roads are back in use, and the Elbe is open once again, so that fishermen can navigate it; various foreign individuals of quality have also arrived here, including His Excellency the lord ambassador Guldenleeuw, who arrived from England via Hamburg, and has continued his journey towards Copenhagen. This morning His Excellency the Count Königsmark was also seen here. From Mainz of the 11th of this month there is news that the intentions of the Count of Hanau in appointing a new council and commander are unknowable; although a few of his neighbours are watching these developments closely, in order to light a fire out of a small spark, and see what the fortress of Hanau, which was governed by the famous Lord Ramsey in the last German wars, can withstand. The Swedish letters of 19 February give notice that Marshal Lutsou entertained many notable guests; that Lieutenant-General Arenschildt died; and [letters] of 20 February that a general fast and prayer-day has been proclaimed, due to a variety of considerations.

LOW COUNTRIES.

Brussels, 20 March. The Prince of Ligne will depart for Spain from here the forthcoming week. Meanwhile it remains uncertain who will take up his position, news of which is anticipated from Spain. The representatives of the lords States General of the United Provinces have been in multiple conferences with the commissaries of this side; it seems that they are discussing the business concerning East-Indian privateering. The reforms have not yet been implemented; the annulment of the tariffs has not yet been followed through. The journey of the King of France towards the Low Countries is now determined, and many preparations are made in the conquered towns to accommodate and receive His Majesty.

The Hague, 25 March. The envoy of Lorraine, having arrived some days ago, is still here, but one cannot deduce for what reason. Last Saturday the French ambassador was visited by several lords, including the lord Gioë, extraordinary envoy of Denmark. The ratification of the Triple Alliance is expected any day from Sweden. Last Friday the Lord Assessor Vrydagh departed from here, after having received satisfactory instructions from their High Mightinesses. Prince [John] Maurice of Nassau is expected any day here, having departed from Cleves last Sunday 23 March. The deliberations of the High Mighty States of Holland continue, and it is presumed that they are to cease this week, when the results of the session will be revealed. The Spanish ambassador has been feeling ill the last few days. Several representatives from the States of Groningen arrived here, in order (so it seems) to resolve some of their differences. Last Saturday the lord of Rijngrove and other lords of quality enjoyed a day out at Scheveningen. The ball said to be organised by her Highness the Princess dowager is actually to be held by the Prince of Orange. It is certain that the Prince of Portugal will hold in quarantine all ships from Holland and Zeeland arriving in his ports, except if they carry with them a certificate from his agents, namely Jeronimus Nunes de Costa for those from Holland, and Francisco de Medina for those from Zeeland, which confirm that the merchandise in the ships has not been taken in from any places contaminated by the plague; ships from Hamburg will also be forced to observe this ruling.

ITALY.

Rome, 24 May. Monsieur Cornato left on Monday for his position as nuncio in Portugal. The Pope, after proposals by Casanatta and Marescotti, did not call for a consistory on Monday, with the excuse that he would attend service in the chapel of Sant'Ivo; the French requested in vain that the consistory would follow on Wednesday. While Innocent now has better relations with Casanatta, the French, and especially Fourbin, appear less at court. The position of Lieutenant-General of the Papal militia has been abolished. As our galleys have to join the Maltese squadron at Spartivento on 8 May [sic, June], the crews have started to embark.

Turin, 24 May. Germans continue to arrive here daily. The garrison of Pinerolo has now been encircled by our soldiers at Vigone, Bagnasco and Macello. The recently deceased Princess Ludovisia, from whose death our Duke will gain 40,000 ecus each year, had appointed several legates to negotiate with the Duchess, the ducal princesses, Madame Royale, Prince Eugene and the Prince of Carignano.

Genoa, 24 May. At 8pm on Monday a fierce bombardment started, which lasted until Tuesday. News came with barges that this bombardment was perpetrated by the French at Oneglia, that they destroyed the fortress there, and disembarked soldiers who burnt down some houses in the area, after plundering all valuable goods. The militia, ordered out for defence, moved out to strongholds in the valley after a disputed encounter with the French troops, in which around ten men died on each side, including a French knight from Malta. Sixty Spanish soldiers have arrived in Finale from a Sardinian ship. The governor of this city fears a French bombardment, and keeps himself informed every day of the movement of the French galleys. The council has appointed eight nobles here for the reception of the Prince of Denmark.

Livorno, 26 May. The Venetian ship The Egyptian Merchant of Nicolo Orechich arrived on the 21st after spending thirty-eight days in Smyrna. Four French ships arrived on the 23rd from Marseille and Genoa; and now the Danes Christianus Quintus and Jan Hestins have arrived via London, Cádiz, Alicante and Genoa; Gottardo Castagnetto, and the English ship Britannia also arrived from Genoa; these all arrived shortly before thirty-five French galleys appeared before Oneglia and fired 5,000 cannonballs and 2,000 bombs, and landed 2,000 men. These soldiers found no resistance, and took four iron pieces of ordnance and a clock, burnt down several shops, but retreated when farmers and soldiers arrived to repel them.

Milan, 28 May. Another two companies of dragoons have been sent to the territory of the Prince of Castiglioni. On the borders nobody is permitted to cut grass with oxen. The Prince of Commercy has been appeased by the Duke of Modena with six beautiful horses and now allows all Germans to cross to Piedmont; several bridges have been erected across the Po for this purpose. Tax revenue for the war continues to arrive daily, but some districts are trying to appeal for exemptions.

Mantua, 28 May. The Germans are beginning to evacuate this area.

Venice, 31 May. From Dalmatia news is confirmed of the gathering of Turkish troops to depart for Hungary. General Trautmannsdorf will wait for more sailors before setting off with a small convoy for the Levant.

ENGLAND, &amp;c.

Dublin, 2 June. It is understood that the Irish in County Kerry assembled, disarmed the English, plundered their homes and mistreated them, after they saw the arrival of several ships, which they thought were French sent out to assist them, but which seem to be the Bilbao fleet; now a regiment of dragoons has been sent out [to Kerry].

Edinburgh, 3 June. The Countesses Seaforth and Perth have received permission to visit their captive husbands in the presence of guards. Various members of the College of Justice, ill-disposed towards the government, have been removed. Today the council received the happy news of the naval victory.

Plymouth, 6 June. Yesterday the Parel, Chattam, and James arrived here with three Dutch warships and a fire ship, and sailed with provisions and ammunition to the fleet. The Samuel and Henry and the ships of the same convoy are preparing for their departure for New England.

Portsmouth, 8 June. Our warships are being repaired quickly, and it is hoped that they will be ready to sail in fourteen days. 300 to 400 wounded sailors have been brought in to hospitals along the coast.

London, 10 June. Admiral Russell left on the 4th of this month for La Hougue, and after having burnt twenty of the fifty enemy transport ships there, he anchored at St Helens on the 5th, and ordered a public service of prayer and thanksgiving on all ships of the fleet for the 6th to give thanks for the magnificent victory. Sir Ashby, after sailing past Le Havre, joined the fleet at St Helens. On Saturday the Earl of Rochester, the Earl of Portland, and Lord Sidney left the fleet for Portsmouth; they were requested there by the Queen, who wished to thank the officers of the fleet for their service offered to their Majesties and the kingdom in the last battle. In order to distribute due honours and rewards a war council will be held. Every day there are more rumours here of the launch of a great enterprise against the enemy; all troops are being marched towards their mustering point. From the Downs we have heard that five Dutch warships, destined for the fleet, arrived on the 8th, and that it was understood from a

Danish ship that had arrived in France that the skipper had seen two large French ships, badly damaged in the fight, at Beachy Head. Various others have been discovered in the same strait, and it is hoped that our ships will be able to capture some of them.

London, 10 June. Admiral Russell (whom some wish to be made a Lord) is to be presented with portraits of their Majesties, while the officers singled out for honours are to receive golden chains and medals; 30,000 pounds is to be distributed amongst the sailors. A war council is to be held at sea and land on Sunday in the presence of the Lords Rochester, Portland, Sidney, Galloway and Leinster. This evening guards were sent to a house at Hyde Park, where many agitated people had gathered: twenty-two men and ten women escaped, beating their way out with fists and rapiers. It is demanded that a squadron of warships be sent to the West Indies to capture the enemies' plantations. Yesterday various prisoners from the Tower and Newgate appeared under Habeas Corpus before the royal court, and requested to be released on bail; which, although it seemed likely last week, was denied. The trained bands of this city have been released from guard duty.

SWITZERLAND.

Basel, 2 June. The Lord Cox travelled the day before yesterday through Baden; yesterday he was entertained at Zürich by the magistrates and militia; he will continue onwards to Schaffhausen, and from there to Frankfurt; at his farewell he gave an oration in Latin, and was seen out by the lords of Zürich, Bern and this city. Today it seems that the credentials of Lord Harward, his successor, have arrived. The affair of the ecclesiastical collections at Lucerne has been resolved by the nuncio; they will, like the others, pay voluntarily.

GERMANY, and the neighbouring states.

Vienna, 1 June. Confirmation of the rumours that our people still hold Pescabara are expected. From the army before Oradea a letter written on the 24th of this month relates that our enemy took down one of our entrenchments, but that our new entrenchments are strong, and the breach in the wall so large that we expect to launch an assault in four days' time. There is no word of the enemy's reinforcements.

Frankfurt, 8 June. Eight deserters have arrived from the French army, which is located several hours from Mainz; the deserters are Irish, and will be allowed to leave tomorrow (to head towards Hungary). The Hessians are coming along the Rhine.

Cologne, 10 June. 4,000 Münster troops are expected soon. The Neuburgers, reinforced to 6,000 men, are on the Mollerheimersheide, and the French are at Steinfeld. They have tried twice to take Euskirchen, but each time they have been beaten back.

Liège, 10 June. The city of Namur has been little damaged in the siege; and it seems that some of the militia did not fight with sufficient zeal. The French wish to appoint Monsieur de Guiscar as governor of the city. Our enemies say continually that they wish to avoid battle and try to capture the castle [of Namur] instead.

LOW COUNTRIES.

Vlissingen, 10 June. Yesterday Captain Michiel Debreë arrived from the Marcenilles with hides, although he was not able to land due to the storm; with him was Adriaen Jaspersz, coming from Faial with wine. Captain Joost Kat in the Spanish West Indies was attacked by a Spanish ship and three barges, and having no hope of escape, he set fire to his ship; the flames spread into the hull, and the ship exploded, killing the crew, save for seven or eight men who were able to reach land.

Middelburg, 10 June. Due to harsh winds the frigate Schomer was beached at Borsele. There are four or five warships at Schooneveld, having arrived from Texel.

Roermond, 11 June. The city of Namur surrendered on the 6th of this month; the garrison is in the castle, and is being attacked ferociously from three sides. On the 8th our army advanced with artillery support towards the river Mehaigne. On the 9th each regiment was required to construct its own pontoon; so it seems that battle was engaged on the 10th, if storm or rain did not prevent it; we are awaiting tidings of the same at any moment.

The Hague, 12 June. News from the army is expected every hour. His Majesty the King of Great Britain and the Elector of Bavaria went on reconnaissance on Sunday and Monday; the post, which arrived yesterday afternoon from the army, related that the pontoons across the Mehaigne were ready to be crossed in order to engage the enemy. The castle of Namur defends itself courageously; this was confirmed with letters from Roermond. The English envoy, Lord Dursley, has dismissed one of his servants and presented him to the justices, for he accuses him of divulging false rumours and fictional accounts of the battle. Baron Degenfeld, envoy of the Elector Palatine, has departed for home. The allied ministers were together this afternoon for a lengthy period, and the lords commissaries of the Admiralties were also in conference regarding naval affairs. Their High Mightinesses look to continue their deliberations. News has been received that the Prince of Nassau, the Stadhouder of Friesland, etc., has recovered from an illness, and wished yesterday to depart from Leeuwarden for The Hague. Yesterday afternoon twelve or fourteen ships passed by Scheveningen, on course for Texel. There was little damage from the latest storm in the Meuse.

Ath, 9 June. Hundreds of people have returned home from the countryside with their wagons; the people say that half of them were not required by the French because they have so many men; some of them worked on the trenches, others transported soil; and others were driven away by the soldiers when they approached them.

Ghent, 11 June. From Ostend there is news that Captain Jan Charles and Captain Hornau took a ship laden with lead, tin and similar wares. Otherwise things are quiet here.

Brussels, 11 June. Invocations of a Godly blessing for the allied army, presently facing the enemy's army, are continued thanks to the stream of people joining the public prayers. According to the news which arrived last evening from the camp at Thines (the headquarters of the King of England, where His Majesty arrived Sunday), we can expect news of a fierce battle any moment, because it is said that over a hundred pontoons have been thrown across the Meuse to engage the enemy, who are only a cannon shot away. There are daily skirmishes, with cannonballs flying back and forth. On the morning of the day before yesterday a detachment of the enemy's cavalry attacked the guards of our dragoons at one of the pontoons; they shot at our dragoons and forced them to flee, and started to break the pontoons, when a general alarm went through our ranks, and the enemy was dispersed, and some of them were slain; from our side Captain Martin and four dragoons of the regiment of Valenzar were killed, and the adjutant general of the Count of Egmont and others were wounded. In the late afternoon another French detachment, from the infantry regiment of Magalotti, arrived to break up the bridges; but our cannon were shooting at them so accurately that they had to withdraw, and according to deserters lost fifty men and two artillery horses. In the same afternoon the ordinary post from the army arrived here with reports that all the preparations for the crossing of the river were completed and the messenger believed that the two armies had engaged in battle, as he heard loud cannon and musket fire on his way over here. Success for the allies is urgently expected, may God grant victory to the allies for the welfare of Europe. Ours at Namur have, in their surrender of the city, taken a variety of cannon, ammunition and victuals from the magazine. Our enemies are now shooting at the castle [at Namur] and the fortress of Colonel Coehoorn with four batteries, and are using their utmost force against the latter, without which they cannot conquer the former. The Count of Guiscar travelled recently to the city as the new governor in Namur; he briefly inspected the city and then returned to the army. The Baron of Berse has become the King's lieutenant in the same [city]. Yesterday the nations [of Brussels] approved the new excise for a three-month term for Negenmanneken.

Brussels, 11 June. It is judged here that the city of Namur surrendered itself without due reason; even when the entrenchments and the gate of St Nicholas were taken, the city could have resisted the enemy's onslaught for several more days, because there was a large moat, no breach in the walls, and attacks from the enemy's positions were well covered. Here there is also muttering about the accord made regarding the fortress in the city, and that nothing is allowed to be delivered between the city and the castle, or vice versa. The part of the city separated by the river Sambre, remained annexed to the castle; ours were able to destroy the bridge behind them, and given that the river is deep it will be impossible for the enemy to undertake anything from that side, or to reach it easily. A strong garrison has been stationed in the city by the enemy, and the remainder of the army has been sent to the Duke of Luxembourg along the two arms of the Meuse. While ours marched along the Meuse on Sunday, Marshal Luxembourg left from Bonnet to counter our march from the other side of the river, and wished to harass us with raids; but they were chased off with cannon shots. The morning on the day before yesterday sixteen men from each company were sent to gather wood for the construction of bridges.

Amsterdam, 3 June [sic, 13 June]. From Rotterdam we heard yesterday evening that two Dutch and an English convoy, as well as various merchantmen, arrived in the Meuse from London; the merchantmen totalled between thirty and forty sails; some had been stuck [on sandbanks] due to the stormy weather, but were able to free themselves and arrived undamaged. The King's yacht under Captain Robertson has also arrived before Rotterdam and the ship of Captain Melison has anchored before Scheveningen. The post barge, departed last Monday for Brabant and France, went down in the Moerdijk due to bad weather, and a Brabant bargeman sailing from Antwerp to Dordrecht was also lost, although the passengers were saved. Due to the latest storm much damage has been done to many of our merchantmen in port. According to news from Texel the Portuguese ship N.S. Buon Para St Anthonio of Captain Francisco Perreyna Vilasboas was lost; together with a small Venetian ship and a small Dutch boat. The Portuguese ship of Captain Maral Brano de Carvalho, destined for Lisbon, took in a considerable amount of water, and that of Manuel Francovas too; the young Abraham and Abraham Leendertsz, both also for Lisbon, and the Morgenstar of Willem Ley for Cádiz, and another ten or twelve flutes were required to cut down their masts. In Enkhuizen a ship arrived from Texel without anchors or rope. The ship De Bel of Hoorn is stuck in the Ems; the St Joseph and the Vergulde Arent both lost their masts at Texel; a few ships are most likely sunk near Urk and one in the Nieuwe Diep. Ten or eleven northbound ships washed up on the Frisian dyke and are now beached, although it is hoped that most can be salvaged; they include the ships of captains Symon Jansz Swaen, Pieter Jansz Swaen, Harke Douwes, Ime Fredriksz, Sibolt Doedes, Aldert Reyndertsz, Broer Reyndertsz and Tjerk Rinkes. In the Vlie various ships have gone down, including the ship of Gerrit Rotgans, destined for the Baltic; Jan Meyndertsz; a Danish ship; an English ketch; and a Genoese ship, the N.S. De Bon Successo. Jan Baptista Beresoni arrived in Texel from Cádiz; as did four ships departed from Curaçao on 4 April, namely the Eendracht of Willem Robbertsz, the Hoop of Pieter Dircksz, the Rachel and the Admirael Tromp of Jan Medemblik; and as we have recently heard, the last has already arrived before this city and the others are at Pampus. Two Zeeland ships, the Lants Welvaren and the gekroonde Maria, sailed up with a convoy, but split off and have turned for Zeeland. A certain skipper in Texel writes that yesterday a large number of ships appeared there; they suppose that it is the Lisbon or Biscay convoy.

The Hague, 13 June. From England two royal yachts arrived carrying Lord George Hamilton, the Earl of Doncaster (son of the last Duke of Monmouth), Lord Cavendish (son of the Earl of Devonshire), and Lt. General Talmash; they are due to depart immediately for His Majesty's army. From the same we have nothing, and from Brussels only that due to the recent rain and the bad weather we could undertake nothing last Tuesday, but that something is to be expected any day. Our Frisian ships were, according to English letters, at the Downs. Their High Mightinesses are currently in session. A conference concerning the slaves is shortly to be held with the envoy from Morocco; and Mr David Torris will help any here or in Amsterdam [to find their lost ones] in the territory of the Sultan.

FRANCE.

Paris, 10 June. The damage inflicted on the [French] fleet in the latest naval battle is found to be worse with every passing day. The warship the Terrible with eighty cannon, commanded by Monsieur de Steppeville, was stranded on the first of this month at La Hougue, and shattered to pieces. Messieurs de Tourville and Amfreville are at La Hougue, and Monsieur de Nesmond, as seems to be the case, was at the Head, to sail for Brest. Troops have been brought in with sloops to guard the transport ships which have not yet been burnt by the enemy at La Hougue. The Pretender to the English throne watched the burning of twelve of our warships. From the squadron at Gabaret we have heard nothing.

Turin, 30 May.<sup>6</sup> According to expectations it now appears that the campaign will be underway, and a general muster will take place at Orbassano (a hovel located around three hours from here in the direction of Pinerolo); the troops begin to march on this place from all corners. Last week around 1,800 German recruits for the regiments of Lorraine, Steinau and Saxe-Coburg passed through here. The Vaudois made several raids into French territory between 19 and 21 May; including into the valley of Catras in the Dauphine, where they plundered various villages and took 1,100 cattle and many other things from the valley, including 12,000 pistols. Now they wish to undertake another raid in the Prigelato, although we have no further news of this. Vaudois women and children pass through here daily from Switzerland and Württemberg, in order to return to their native lands.

Hamburg, 10 June. From Copenhagen it is written that the French ambassador lost much money gambling that the Pretender would be restored by the end of May.<sup>7</sup>

Liège, 10 June. The post from here for France has been provisionally prohibited. In the siege of the city of Namur neither side suffered many casualties; much better is expected from the castle.

Cádiz, 19 May.<sup>8</sup> On 6 May there arrived here from Venice the ship D'Europa of Gysbert Petier, and D'Elisabeth of Titus Smit, from Gibraltar. On 7 May De Juffr. Joann of Michel Ripper from Sanlúcar. On 8 May the St Bartholomeus of David Flaming, from Livorno. On 9 May La Asia of Anastasio Cornet from Xante and Alicante, and the Vlugteling of Jacob Croese from Zeeland. On 10 May La Misericordia of Pedro Passarini from Xante, De Burger of Joachem Crasser from Stockholm, 't Wapen van Staden of Lubbert Volkerts from Livorno, D'Ulrica Leonora of Pieter Hogen from Málaga, the Sacramento of Nicolo Baboggia from Mallorca, 't Wapen van Sevilje of Jan Baptista Laurens, De Coning van Polen of Frans Vos, D'Agatha of Dirk Sijp, and 't Haerlemmer Bos of Jacob Muysen, all from Málaga. On 11 May the St Agniet of Gysbert van Beenen and d'Agatha of Willem Joosten from Sanlúcar. On 12 May the Santa Theresa of Cosme Melo from Bilbao; and on 14 May the 4 Molenaers of Jesse Mansvelt from Sanlúcar. On 15 May there departed the ships De Coning Carel of Hendrick Knees, and d'Ulrica Leonora of Jacob Hogen for Amsterdam; D'Elisabeth of Pieter Frese, 't Wapen van Staden of Lubbert Volkerts, and De Burger of Joachem Crasser for Hamburg; De Maria of Jan Eylander and De Graef van Laerwijk of Harmen Tomasz for Amsterdam; De Coning Salomon of Dirck Meyer for Hamburg; De Fairfax of Nicolaes Fairfax for London; De St Francisco of Francisco Levanto and De Sacramento of Nicolaes Baboggia for Amsterdam; De Juffr. Anna of Christiaen Moller for Hamburg; D'Europa of Gysbert Petier for Zeeland; De Vredens Prins of Dirck Heemjes for Galicia; and La Asia of Anastasio Cornet for London.

Cartagena, 19 May. The ship De Vogel Phoenix of Jan de Vogel is preparing to sail at Alicante; the skipper sent an express here yesterday to skipper Jan Hendricksz Peyns in the ship De Coning van Polen, to sail in company, and he plans to depart with him one of the following days.

Madrid, 28 May. The Marquis of Constans will return to Catalonia as governor-general of the region, and with the expectation that he will be made Viceroy after the return of the Duke of Medina. The position of Lord High Chamberlain of the Dowager Queen has been granted to the Marquis de los Balveses and the Marquise de Camerassa has been appointed High Lady of the same Queen. Tomorrow their Majesties will return from Aranguez.

Bilbao, 30 May. A few days ago the Marquis of Gastanaga, former governor of His Majesty in the Low Countries, arrived at San Antonio.

In The Hague with Levijn van Dijck and the widow of Pieter Hagen there has newly been printed and published Bericht van de Constitutie van alle de illustre Vergaderingen en Collegien in 's Gravenhage, met de Benaminge van alle de Leden, die daer in Sessie hebben, mitsgaders aenwijsinge van der selver Woon-

G. Pieterse, broker, will sell on Wednesday 17 June in Amsterdam, in the Kalverstraat, in the Keysers Kroon, a large collection of expensive gold, silver, and silk brocades, cloth, wool, lint, &c.

Extraordinary Newspapers for Extraordinary Times. Satirical Newspapers in the Dutch Republic, 1661–1691

Seventeenth-century newspapers have been considered here primarily as an aspect of news culture. The newspaper was not, with its litany of unadorned factual reports, an especially literary form. But as the tropes of news reporting became more engrained in the everyday reading experience of polite society, they too became ripe for parody. From the second half of the century onwards we see the emergence of a new and rather fascinating literary sub-genre, the satirical newspaper. These texts, which have never before been studied in any detail, flourished amidst the political and moral crises of the late seventeenth-century Dutch Republic as an alternative form of literary satire. I have thus far located fourteen different satirical newspapers, all published anonymously between 1661 and 1691. These satirical newspapers, although varied in content and comic intent, have one common characteristic: they assumed the titles, format and structure of Dutch newspapers in order to make a political or moral statement. Authentic Dutch newspapers were not themselves the object of satire. Instead the conventions of the newspaper style were appropriated for political commentary and parody; an appropriation that was neat and amusing precisely because such commentary openly contradicted the spirit of the sober, judicious and largely factual reporting which characterised the newspaper.

Newspapers fulfilled a particular role in the menu of factual publications available to the sophisticated reading public in the Dutch Republic. Their content was very largely composed of foreign, diplomatic and military news, alongside news of the comings and goings at Europe's princely courts. The digest of reports presented under organised datelines was inextricably associated with the form and function of the newspaper. It was these standards which so clearly distinguished the couranten and gazettes from the libellen (libels), boecxkens (little books), and topical tijdingen (news) published in pamphlet form. Domestic political news was limited in these newspapers to reports of the movements of the Prince of Orange or other dignitaries; the announcements of deliberations by the States General or the provincial States; the nomination of new burgomasters, aldermen and professors; and official documents circulated by officers of state. The Dutch newspaper reader did not expect to find insightful political commentary on the state of the country in their weekly paper. Instead they read the newspaper to foster their understanding of contemporary political affairs within the wider world. For more mundane domestic matters, readers might turn to the advertisements and public announcements towards the end of their newspapers. These, through their miscellany of goods for sale, children and valuables lost, and dangerous criminals at large, introduced a leavening mix of the prosaic and everyday.

Dutch satirical newspapers found much of their appeal in the careful appropriation of the sober, factual style of newspaper reporting. But they also realised the rich comic potential of parodying advertisements and public announcements. This is achieved in almost every case with careful imitation. Most satirical news reports are listed under authentic news centres and geographical locations; the language of news writers is also copied faithfully: "We have heard here that ...", "From Madrid we have learned that ...", "It is said here that ...", and so forth. It can often take several sentences before the "news report" arrives at the comic denouement or allusion. Advertisements are similarly satirised with great care, including the use of statements such as Segget voorts (pass on the word). Most advertisements in satirical newspapers relate to the publication of books, here with allegorical titles (for example, the Bygone trade of Amsterdam, or The Life of Brutus). On other occasions they appeal for the return of politically-charged belongings—often alluding to an individual or a city's honour or finances. These comic appropriations of the normal terms of trade use a sprinkling of well-known classical references, but most allusions are to contemporary political rulers, diplomats and states; although they often appear arch and rather elusive to us today, they would have been clear enough to the well-informed Dutch newspaper reader in their own time.

Citizens who were subscribers to the weekly newspapers would have instantly recognised that these satirical newspapers were no ordinary publications. The irony of the appropriation of the newspaper form, combined with the humorous literary style, meant that for those in the know, these were cherished recreational texts: to be laughed over, shared, discussed and collected. The fact that they were indeed collected in this way is evident from the high survival rates of many of these satirical newspapers. Most seventeenth-century Dutch newspapers survive only in one or two copies—but some of the satirical newspapers survive in at least ten copies; others were popular enough to warrant the publication of at least three or four variant editions.

Like most historical humour these texts do not wear particularly well. A medium-ranking official who has now largely passed from the historical record may not seem now to merit the scorn, often cruel and pointed, that was unleashed upon him. Some of the reports are so brief as to be bafflingly opaque. But for a society where official news organs steered so clear of domestic politics, they make an interesting variation of the pamphlet libel, a sub-genre in which the newspaper itself does not escape some light mockery. Two case studies below, taken from 1661 and 1684 respectively, offer characteristic examples, and attempt to unpack the hidden meanings of the text.

One-Eyed Lovers in the News

The earliest two examples of satirical newspapers date from 1661: De Nieuwe Haegse Middel-weeckse Courant. No. 1. and the Haeghsche Mercurius Of Verscheyde Post-Tydingen. Both survive in the university library in Ghent.<sup>1</sup> They were published as broadsheets; the first printed on both sides, the second on the recto only. They mimic perfectly the standard style of Dutch newspapers, and contain a variety of “news reports” printed in double columns. But these satirical newspapers are quite unlike others printed later in the century: all the satirical news reports are written in verse, and they take as their subject a romantic scandal which took place in Amsterdam in 1661.<sup>2</sup>

In this year a pamphlet-storm erupted in the city after the relationship between a French merchant, Gabriel de Lalande, and a daughter from a rich Dutch mercantile family, Elisabeth Lestevenon, broke off in spectacular fashion. The two were not married, but had engaged in an intimate relationship for several months. When Elisabeth broke off the affair, and the lawyer Hendrik Cloeck presented himself as her future husband, Gabriel de Lalande responded indignantly. De Lalande began to spread rumours about their relationship, detailing their sexual activity and thereby impugning the honour of Elisabeth and her family. The Lestevenon family appealed to the Amsterdam magistrates, who imprisoned Gabriel for seventy days, but this did not prevent his allegations being paraded for public amusement. While Gabriel was imprisoned poets, printers and booksellers disseminated dozens of satirical pamphlets, songs and libels, mocking the Lestevenons and in some cases also Lalande.

The satirical newspapers of 1661 joined in the attacks on Elisabeth Lestevenon. The fictional reports in both issues are from locations highly relevant to the case: “Bordeaux” (De Lalande’s birthplace), “Nonnenburch” (the fortress of nuns), “Lijslandt” (Lizzy-land, but also used to describe Latvia in real newspapers), and “Magdeburg” (the authentic German city, well known to Dutch newspaper readers, but also “fortress of virgins”). The satire is particularly crude, commenting with lascivious glee on the sexual nature of the affair:

From Magdeburg the 26th of July.

P.S. They say he [Lalande] is in the city [Magdeburg]
And that he has caressed her,
For so long, until they together
Emerged exhausted from the Maasland<sup>3</sup>

Each report satirises an aspect of the former relationship, but some also poke fun at the new lover of Elisabeth Lestevenon, Hendrick Cloeck. The Nieuwe Haegse Middel-weeckse Courant features several “announcements”, including one appealing to the reader to find a gentleman named “K.” (meaning Cloeck):

P.S. There’s a certain gentleman missing,
He’s squandered his honour, worth and status,
Does anyone know of him? You can’t miss him,
He has one eye, he’s proud as a peacock,
He belongs here at home [in The Hague], his name is K.
[Whoever finds him] will receive a drinking-penny,
So he will not end up in Amsterdam;
Where there are many who would spit at him,
With fire and flame, indeed, who promise,
To rob him of his other eye.<sup>4</sup>

Authentic appeals to newspaper readers for the loss of children were by this time common in Dutch newspapers, as were appeals for help in tracking down wanted fugitives. The above notification pays fitting tribute to the style of such announcements.

While the two satirical newspapers survive only in a single copy, the texts of both newspapers can also be found in a collection of satirical poetry and literature on the Lalande affair. Towards the end of 1661 the printer Johannes van den Bergh gathered together many of the publications surrounding the romantic scandal, and published the collected volume De soete vryagie van monsr. Gabriel de Lalande; of d’afgevalle roos van juffr. Elisabeth L’Estevenon (The sweet courtship of Mr Gabriel de Lalande, or the fallen rose of Miss Elisabeth Lestevenon).<sup>5</sup> Within this octavo volume the satirical newspapers lost their archetypal form as single sheet newspapers, but their humorous verse remained preserved for posterity.

2 The scandal is documented by Bauke Hekman in his De affaire De Lalande-Lestevenon: feit en fictie over een spraakmakend schandaal in het zeventiende-eeuwse Amsterdam (Leiden, Leiden University Press, 2010).

1684: Year of Discord

Explosive public debate is a well-known feature of Dutch Golden Age society. The Remonstrant crisis of the later 1610s, William II's attack on Amsterdam in 1650 and the events of the tumultuous Disaster Year 1672 all prompted torrents of short political tracts, poems, songs, ordinances and petitions.<sup>6</sup> One of the lesser known, but similarly fierce media storms erupted in 1683 and 1684, during the War of the Reunions, which saw France invade and rapidly overrun the Spanish Southern Netherlands. Prompted by fears of renewed French aggression after the lengthy Franco-Dutch War (1672–1678), Stadhouder William III demanded an expansion of the Dutch army, but he found himself at loggerheads with the mercantile regents of many Dutch towns and provinces.<sup>7</sup> The resolutions, memoranda and speeches of Dutch regents and foreign ambassadors commenting on the latest political developments were printed in enormous quantities, and debate spread from the magistrates' chambers out onto the street.

The debate provoked the publication of at least seven satirical newspapers. These all appeared as half-sheet quarto pamphlets. Most of the titles adopted the characteristic newspaper device of the "extraordinary courant", or special issue. This was a common practice for authentic newspaper publishers, who would publish special issues after receiving urgent news of important military engagements or political developments. The titles of the satirical newspapers also hinted at the tribulations of the period: Twistmaand (month of discord), Twyffel-maent (month of doubt), and Troubeljaer (year of troubles). In typical pamphleteering fashion, one satirical newspaper was produced in response to another, such as the Korte Aanmerkinge over de Extraordinaire Courant in twistmaand (Brief remarks regarding the Extraordinaire Courant in the month of discord). There are also references to the Twist-courant in the Courant tot gemeene best (Newspaper for the common good).

The 1684 satirical newspapers usually open with several "foreign" news reports, but turn swiftly to discuss "Dutch" news reports. The satire is directed against the supporters of the Prince of Orange and their militarising agenda; or against the peace-minded regents, who seem to care more for their purse than the safety of their country. The Mercurius Gallo-Belgicus (a reference to the late-sixteenth century bi-annual review) revelled in the frustration of the Orangist cause in a report from Cádiz of 12 April:

After lengthy deliberations it is here prohibited, with the threat of serious punishment, to import Frisian and Groningen butter; and care will also be taken to ensure that all Hollandish butter, which is here imported, is deemed to be proudly Orange, on pain of confiscation.

Placuit color aureus iste [This seems to be the golden colour]<sup>8</sup>

The joke here played on the obstinacy of the States of Friesland and Groningen in refusing the proposals of William III. Holland was another battleground for the Prince of Orange, where he lobbied hard to convince the eighteen cities with voting rights in the States to support the expansion of the armed forces. While he won over some of the obdurate councils (such as Leiden), Amsterdam remained steadfast, and together with Friesland and Groningen ultimately defeated the Prince's proposals.

On the other side of the debate, the Extraordinaire Nieuwigheden uit verscheidene Gewesten in 't schrikkel Jaar 1684 (Extraordinary novelties from various provinces in the leap year 1684) denounced the regents of Amsterdam for obstructing the expansion of the army, which was allegedly due to their Francophile leanings. In a report from "Amsterdam" of 7 May the newspaper reports that

Here has been sung the Te Deum Laudamus, regarding the agreement of a twenty-year peace, at which the ministers of France, Denmark, Brandenburg and Cologne were all present; but while the Spaniards are collapsing so spectacularly, the musicians received for their efforts a good drinking-penny ...<sup>9</sup>

The newspaper also used several advertisements to denounce the pacifist cause, and its chief proponent, Amsterdam:

Notification.

In Antwerp, with Hieronymus Plancius, has been printed the Description of the bygone trade of Amsterdam.

...

In The Hague, due to the carelessness of a stupid clerk, there has been lost a large book, which contains all receipts of state: whoever can return it, will enjoy a significant reward.

Concordia res parvæ crescunt ["Small states flourish in concord", the motto of the States General]<sup>10</sup>

The use of the motto of the States General appealed especially to the unity of the confederal state—highlighting the pettiness of the regents who refused to safeguard the rest of the country. The Courant tot gemeene best also targeted the attitudes of the urban regents, who sought peace with France at any cost. The newspaper claims to have been written by the "celebrated doctor Jan Alleman" (John Everyman), a pseudonym often used on political pamphlets to symbolise a member of the ignorant but pretentious rabble. The newspaper states that it has been "disseminated with the press, in order to satisfy the contemporary faction [the Orangists], and to inform the United Provinces that they do not have to fear the might of France." The newspaper pretends to be produced by Republican regents, but it swiftly becomes clear that it is actually a publication mocking them. All reports in the Courant tot gemeene best are datelined from Dutch towns, and most are no longer than a single sentence:

Gouda.

From here there is nothing special, except that the mussels are hanging over the fire; may God allow us to cook them nicely.

Alkmaar.

Our finances are decent, because we keep a bare house.

Hoorn.

Here many drink a glass of wine, because it is not worth fixing what's been broken.

Enkhuizen.

We are great followers.<sup>11</sup>

Today these references may seem bafflingly obscure, but in 1684 satirical newspapers offered their readers plenty of laughs. They were not, however, necessarily intended to persuade. They could normally rely on the fact that their purchasers shared the sentiments expressed. They appealed to pre-existing conceptions of Dutch identity and politics, and required even in their own time a significant level of understanding of the political conflict at hand for their jibes to find their target. The satirical newspapers can be seen more appropriately as providing an outlet for the frustrations of many newspaper readers who will have followed the weekly progress of the French army in 1683 and 1684 into the Southern Netherlands. In the satirical newspapers they were instead confronted with the follies of their domestic political opponents; a common but welcome distraction in the fractured Dutch Republic.

Dutch and Flemish Newspapers of the Seventeenth Century: Bibliographical Working Method

Although early newspapers have attracted considerable attention in scholarly literature during the past century, there is no observable consensus as to how newspapers should be described bibliographically.<sup>1</sup> Holdings are divided between libraries and archives. Libraries tend to describe all the issues of a particular paper under a single catalogue entry; archives, if they are aware of these holdings, give a reference to the folder or volume where they are located. Often they will be found mixed in with mostly manuscript material. Individual newspaper issues have thus come to share the ambiguous status, between book and manuscript, familiar to other types of printed ephemera. As a result there is no fixed standard for what bibliographical details should properly be recorded.

The only existing bibliography of seventeenth-century Dutch newspapers is Folke Dahl's Dutch Corantos (1946), which describes the then known surviving issues for the earliest years, 1618 to 1650. Dahl organised his bibliography strictly by place of publication: the Amsterdam papers are followed by the more modest production of Arnhem and Delft. The Amsterdam newspapers were grouped by publisher. Dahl introduced the publisher before briefly presenting their newspapers, highlighting in particular changes in the newspaper's title, imprint or design. After each introduction, Dahl grouped surviving issues by year, listing them in chronological order. He included the issue number, the date and relevant library codes. Dahl was responsible for the first analysis of the enormous collection of newspapers discovered at the beginning of the twentieth century in the Kungliga Biblioteket in Stockholm. His bibliography is thus very largely a collation and comparison between this collection (abbreviated S) and the collections of the Bibliothèque Mazarine in Paris (P) and the Koninklijke Bibliotheek in The Hague (H). Descriptions are presented thus:

No 24—16 June S
No 25—23 June S

1636
No 4—26 Jan. S

1637
No 20—16 May S
No 25—20 June P
No 26—27 June P

A different approach is evident in the more recent bibliography of seventeenth-century German newspapers by Else Bogel and Elger Blümm. In their Die Deutschen Zeitungen des 17. Jahrhunderts (1971–1985) the authors offer a more abbreviated form of bibliographical record combined with a longer accompanying commentary. The newspapers are organised chronologically, commencing with the earliest known newspaper, the Strasbourg Relation (1605–1667). Each entry contains a transcription of the title, including changes made during the run of the newspaper. This is followed by a section on imprint, format and collation. Then the authors present a list of surviving copies by number, grouped by year:

1631 1, 2, 16, 18, 22, 23, 47
1632 1–15, 18–20, 29, 30, 35–37, 41, 42
1633 3, 6, 7, 10, 13, 29–32, 37

No dates are provided for specific issue numbers. The next section lists the institutions which hold surviving issues: this list usually offers not specific issue numbers but a range of years, followed by a notice whether the holding contains a “complete” or “incomplete” run of newspapers. Thus if more than one institution holds issues for one particular year, it is functionally impossible, on the basis of this bibliography, to tell which issues are where. The two final sections describe the general history of the newspaper and any further literature.

The present bibliography seeks to combine some elements from both methodologies. It aims to provide a relatively large amount of data for each single newspaper issue, whilst ordering the newspapers chronologically irrespective of place of publication. Each newspaper is introduced by an essay laying out the history of the paper, special characteristics of style and content, and what is known of its publishers. The following sections outline this methodology in further detail.

Standards of Inclusion

Included in the bibliography are all Dutch-language newspapers published in the Dutch Republic and the Habsburg Southern Netherlands during the course of the seventeenth century. These newspapers, forty-three in total, contain the characteristics considered to define the “early newspaper”: public availability, uniform appearance, seriality, a periodical schedule of publication, and miscellany (that is, the presentation of contemporary events with an unrestricted geographical scope).

The bibliography also contains six Dutch-language “news serials”—ventures which are similar to newspapers in some respects, but lack the strict periodicity to which newspapers aspire; sometimes they are focused too exclusively on a particular geographical area to meet the normal criterion for a newspaper.<sup>2</sup> These news ventures were often published by the same entrepreneurs responsible for newspapers, and competed within a similar market for serial news. Some genuine newspapers, such as the Haegsche Weekelycke Mercurius (1655–1658), also contained supplementary irregular issues, which were included in the numbered series but were devoted to a single news event, rather than offering the normal range of news reports. Such irregular issues are also included here, as are the “extraordinary” issues, offered by regular newspapers, but not included in their numbered sequence.

News serials or journals with an exclusive focus on commentary (be it political, economic or satirical), rather than the reporting of current events, have been excluded, and so have serials with a monthly (or longer) periodicity.

Chronological Presentation

The newspapers in the bibliography are presented chronologically. The Amsterdam Courante uyt Italien, Nederlandt, &c., is treated first given that the earliest known issue dates from 1618. All issues of the newspaper, dating from 1618 to 1669, are then listed. The Courante uyt Italien is followed by the second newspaper of the Low Countries, the Amsterdam Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, which dates from 1619 to 1671; and so forth. Newspapers from different towns in the Northern and Southern Netherlands are not separated, but follow one another in this chronological sequence.

If a newspaper is presumed to have been published prior to the year of the earliest extant edition, then this is reflected in the chronological presentation. It is certain from archival evidence that the Arnhemse Courant was published from 1619, rather than 1621 (the year of its first surviving issue). It is therefore presented before the Delft Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt ende Nederland of 1620–1643.

Distinction between Series

Sometimes newspaper publishers made changes to the title, frequency or design of their newspaper. It can be complicated to assess whether these changes signal a new venture, or whether one should still regard this as a single series. For example, Adriaen Vlacq published three periodical ventures in The Hague between 1653 and his death in 1667—these are all considered as distinct newspapers, given that they contain significant differences in title, lay-out, frequency and content.<sup>3</sup> However, the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante of Joost Broersz is considered in this bibliography to have started in 1638 as the Courante Extra-Ordinaire: continued with a different title, but similar design and content.<sup>4</sup> Justifications of these distinctions are provided in the introductions to the newspapers.

The first newspapers published in the Low Countries were weekly newspapers. Most were numbered from 1 through to 52 or 53 during the year, after which the numbering cycle started again.<sup>5</sup> Soon the first bi-weekly and tri-weekly newspapers appeared. Some of these ventures were numbered as one consecutive annual series: 1 through to 104 or 1 through to 156. Others are numbered separately: for example, the issues of the tri-weekly Europische Courant appeared on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays. Each day of the week is numbered from 1 through to 52. Folke Dahl treated a tri-weekly newspaper such as the Europische Courant as three different news-

<sup>2</sup> The news serials are presented in chapters 8, 10, 21, 22, 27 and 41.

Newspaper Introductions

The description of each newspaper consists of two sections: a prose introduction and a bibliographical list of issues. The introduction contains details of the lifespan, appearance, design and content of the newspaper; the life and career of its publishers and printers; and its context within the news market. The introductions contain references to scholarly literature where appropriate; further reading may be found in the bibliography presented at the end of part one of this work.

Some newspapermen reappear throughout the bibliography as publishers or associates of different newspapers. In this case they are introduced at length at their first appearance, but not to a similar extent in the introduction to their second newspaper. Thus the widow of Joost Broersz, Willemijntje Broersz, is introduced as publisher of the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante (1638–1671), but is only mentioned briefly as publisher of the short-lived Saterdaghsche Courante (1648).

Most introductions also feature an illustration of one of the issues of the newspaper under consideration.

The Structure of the Bibliographical Lists

Most issues of surviving newspapers will be presented as follows:

*No. 6 Oprechte Haerlemse Dingsdaegse
USTC N31-932. NHA*; SABB
Madrid, Milan, Rome (2), Venice (2), Paris (3), Copenhagen, Neuburg an der Donau, Hamburg (2), Cologne, Vlissingen (4), Maastricht, The Hague
(2), Amsterdam

The first line provides a transcription of the title as given on the newspaper issue. As almost all newspapers included the issue number in the title, this is given as it is stated (some newspaper titles open with the issue number, whereas other end with it). Misprints in the title, whether in spelling or numbering, are given as stated, but a misprint in the numbering is always followed in square brackets by the accurate number. Newspapers often varied in the spelling of the title from one issue to another, and occasionally omitted punctuation. Again, all components of the title are given as stated.

The title is immediately followed by the date of publication. Similar to the protocol with the issue number, if the date is misprinted in the issue, the accurate date is provided in square brackets after the misprinted date. If no date is present, a date may be inferred, given in brackets.

The next line contains the record number of the newspaper issue as presented on the Universal Short Title Catalogue (USTC).<sup>6</sup> This is the only collective database which incorporates newspaper issues as individual books, rather than grouped under their title, as is the practice in many library catalogues.

The USTC number is followed by the code of the institution which holds the surviving issue (a list of these codes follows below). When a newspaper has survived in more than one institution, an asterisk after the code notes which copies have been inspected for the purpose of this bibliography.

Places of Correspondence

The following line of the surviving record contains a list of reports, or places of correspondence, as presented in the newspaper issue.<sup>7</sup> The content of early modern newspapers was made up of a compilation of (mainly international) news reports, redacted from manuscript newsletters and other newspapers or publications, or provided by one of the paper's own network of correspondents. Reports would be headlined by their original place of correspondence, together with the date of the report: "Rome, 22 October" or "Paris, 2 November". Here a report from "Rome" does not necessarily include only news about Rome or its environs; it merely indicates that the publisher received a report despatched from Rome. These places of correspondence are all captured in the record of each newspaper issue.

It was common for newspaper issues to contain more than one report from a particular location. In this instance, the total number of reports present in an issue is provided in brackets: "Rome (3)". On rare occasions newspaper publishers provided more elaborate headlines for reports: "narrative of the recent naval battle between the Swedish and Danish fleets". Here the full headline is given.

Newspaper publishers sometimes followed their places of correspondence with a compilation of news without dated headlines. Often separated by a line break, this news “below the line” was collected from unnamed miscellaneous sources available to newspaper publishers locally: a story heard at the bourse, the sighting of the arrival of an East-India vessel in the docks, or a report recounted to the publisher in the print shop. News collected from this informal news grid, rather than the vast correspondence network maintained by news writers, was invariably sourced close to the place of publication of the newspaper—even if it did not consist exclusively of local news. It is therefore described in the bibliographic record as “domestic news”, and abbreviated as “domestic”. Towards the end of the seventeenth century the system of “news below the line” was phased out. Instead newspaper publishers invested in maintaining regular correspondents in nearby cities, or even their hometown, to collect news.

At the start of the seventeenth century places of correspondence were organised chronologically: the oldest reports were set first; the most recent reports came last. From the 1630s Flemish newspapers began to employ a geographically-orientated structure, grouping reports by national or linguistic spheres: Spain, Italy, France, the German speaking-lands, and so on. Dutch newspapers gradually adopted this structure from the 1650s onwards. The headings used for this geographic organisation are not included in the bibliographic description of newspaper issues.

When a newspaper issue has survived but has not been inspected (1% of all surviving issues in this bibliography), then no places of correspondence are provided.

The news serials, as opposed to the newspapers listed in the bibliography, usually do not contain a similar system of places of correspondence. Instead, they often focus on a single event, report or narrative, or present an edited compilation of news without specific headers. A brief description of such content is provided instead of places of correspondence.

Modern English spelling is used for the description of places of correspondence in the bibliography: “Vienna” instead of “Wien”, “Marseille” instead of “Marseilles”, “The Hague” instead of “Den Haag”. The exception to this rule is the spelling of four German places of correspondence now located in Eastern European countries. The bibliography here uses the early modern German version as it was written in seventeenth-century newspapers for the following places: ‘Danzig’ instead of ‘Gdańsk’, ‘Königsberg’ instead of ‘Kaliningrad’, ‘Stettin’ instead of ‘Szczecin’ and ‘Breslau’ instead of ‘Wrocław’. Constantinople is also used instead of Istanbul.

A few places of correspondence re-occur thousands of times in this bibliography. More than 2,000 are listed only a few times. Some of these minor locations are difficult to trace on a modern map. They were often translated several times before reaching a seventeenth-century newspaper, with associated misspellings or bastardisations. I have endeavoured to find the modern equivalent for such locations, but when this has proved impossible, I have stuck to the precise Dutch spelling used in the newspaper.

Advertisements and Public Announcements

The proprietors of newspapers of the Low Countries were pioneers in the adoption of paid advertisements.<sup>8</sup> Abraham Verhoeven, the first Antwerp newspaper publisher, placed the first advertisements known to have appeared in any European newspaper in 1620, though admittedly these were exclusively for his own publications (and often simply advertised the next issue in the serial). From 1621 the Amsterdam newspapers began to accept notifications for their forthcoming new books from other booksellers and publishers; by the 1630s and 1640s the vast majority of Dutch newspapers contained at least one such advertisement. The placement of advertisements would come to underpin the economics of the newspaper trade in the later seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, providing a lifeline for many ventures.

This bibliography makes a distinction between the placement in the newspapers of advertisements and public announcements. The former concern the commercial sale of a good or service: the publication of a book, the notification of an auction or a public sale, or the offer of the services of a schoolmaster or doctor, amongst others. Public announcements consist of notifications which were placed by Dutch or Flemish authorities and public institutions or appeals placed by individuals without commercial purpose. These include the announcement of new market-days by the magistrates of a town, a notification regarding a wanted criminal, or an appeal for the return of lost personal possessions.

If an inspected newspaper issue contains a single advertisement, then the list of places of correspondence is followed by “(A1)”. If an issue contains a single public announcement, a “(P1)” can be found in the same place. A newspaper with a mixture of advertisements and public announcements contains, for example, “(A2) (P3)”.

The Survival of Seventeenth-Century Dutch and Flemish Newspapers

More than 16,000 issues of Dutch and Flemish newspapers of the seventeenth century have been located in eighty-four libraries, archives, museums and private collections in thirteen countries.<sup>9</sup> The number of newspaper issues found in each institution varies considerably. Around two dozen institutions hold fewer than ten newspaper issues each, whereas the five largest holdings account collectively for over 14,000 copies.<sup>10</sup> Some institutions contain issues of only one or a small number of different newspapers, while others, such as the National Archives in Kew or the university library in Ghent, hold issues of over twenty different newspapers.

Seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish newspapers are ephemeral documents. They have suffered a very high rate of attrition: only around 40% of the total presumed production of Dutch and Flemish newspapers survives today. When an issue has survived, this is usually the only copy known: around 60% of all surviving issues described in this bibliography cannot be traced in a second copy. Newspapers have survived in a variety of ways, resulting in variations in survival rates from different periods in the seventeenth century. Over 80% of the issues of the tri-weekly Oprechte Haerlemse Courant between 1656 and 1700 can be found today, but other newspapers, such as the Amsterdam Saterdaeghsche Courante (1648) or the Weesp Oprechte Donderdagse Courant (1666) survive in only a few issues in one year. Even a newspaper with a lifespan of more than fifty years, such as the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, can suffer a loss of close to three-quarters of all issues published.

These contrasting experiences reflect the different papers' contemporary collecting history. Some newspapers were immediately collected as they were pulled off the press. The publishers of the tri-weekly Oprechte Haerlemse Courant and the Amsterdamsche Courant evidently held back at least one copy of each issue upon publication. These collections were passed down the publishing firm, and today survive in the Noord-Hollands Archief in Haarlem and the Stadsarchief in Amsterdam. Apart from several missing volumes, this virtuous institutional practice provides a near-complete run of each newspaper. While other newspaper publishers were likely to have done the same, their business archives are sadly lost.

Newspapers have also survived as personal collections of subscribers or readers. The Erfgoedbibliotheek in Antwerp holds a near-complete run of the bi-weekly Antwerpsche Post-Tijdinge for the year 1700—this was collected and bound by a contemporary subscriber of the newspaper, who compiled a handwritten index of events at the end of the year.<sup>11</sup> A volume of over 400 Amsterdam newspapers found in the Koninklijke Bibliotheek in The Hague was presumably compiled by a similar subscriber in the 1620s and 1630s, before being bought in 1698 for only a couple of gulden by another interested collector.

Many other newspaper issues have survived as stray copies. Some can be found intermingled with volumes of seventeenth-century correspondence in archives. In institutions where hundreds of stray issues could be found, such as the Kungliga Biblioteket in Stockholm or the National Archives in Kew, the copies were removed from diplomatic correspondence, and bound in separate volumes. While this has preserved the newspapers, allowing easier access for scholars, it has also removed the individual issues from their seventeenth-century context.

Stray issues found in library collections can be even more difficult to place. Sometimes an issue is bound with other contemporary documents, such as news pamphlets, political tracts or edicts, but often it is now preserved unbound in a loose paper folder. The context can sometimes reveal why a newspaper found its way into a particular collection: the only issue of the Wekelycke Nieuws (The Hague, 1652–1655) present in the Herzog August library in Wolfenbüttel is presumably there because a report published in the issue commented in embarrassing terms on an accident involving Duke August of Braunschweig-Lüneburg, whose collection provided the foundations of the library.<sup>12</sup>

Lost Issues

The high rate of loss of seventeenth-century newspaper issues leaves one with an incomplete bibliographic record. While some issues now presumed to be lost will hopefully be found in the future, others seem likely to have disappeared forever. Luckily, the serial nature of newspapers allows one to reconstruct the lost output of the periodical

9 In order of largest number of holding institutions, these countries are: The Netherlands (31), Germany (15), Belgium (9), United Kingdom (7), United States of America (7), Sweden (4), Russia (3), France (2), Denmark (2), Ireland (1), Switzerland (1), Poland (1) and the Czech Republic (1).

10 These are, in order of magnitude: the Noord-Hollands Archief (Haarlem), Stadsarchief (Amsterdam), Persmuseum (Amsterdam), National Archives (Kew), and Koninklijke Bibliotheek (The Hague).

11 See chapter 49.

12 See chapter 23.

press at least partially. Following the practice established by the USTC of documenting “lost books” (that is, books which no longer survive but which one can reasonably presume to have been published), this bibliography aims to do the same and include lost newspaper issues.<sup>13</sup>

Given that newspaper issues are part of a numbered series and appear at regular periodical intervals, the survival of one issue reveals the publication of many others. If issue number 34 of any given year has survived, one can reasonably presume that numbers 1 through to 33 preceded it. Likewise, if one has numbers 14 and 42, one can infer the publication of numbers 1–13 and 15–41. Using the date of the surviving issues, the lost issues can also be dated according to the weekly, bi-weekly or tri-weekly schedule of publication.

One can extend this practice over several years. Many newspapers are known to have been published over a period of multiple years: but sometimes only a few issues have survived for each year. For example, if one has located numbers 12–23 of 1630, numbers 2, 18 and 40 of 1631, number 2 of 1632 and numbers 15–46 of 1633, then one can reasonably infer the publication of number 1 of 1630 through to number 14 of 1633.

This bibliography presents such lost issues intermingled with surviving issues. Lost issues are indicated by the number lost (No. 1, No. 2, etc.), followed by the presumed date of publication in square brackets. Instead of a library code every lost issue contains the note “No copy”. The inferring of lost issues is always subject to the particular characteristics of each newspaper, and any decision regarding the extent of inferring is always given at the end of the relevant newspaper introduction. If a newspaper had an irregular schedule of publication, or featured many misnumbered issues, no lost issues are inferred. On the other hand, if a newspaper was published with strict regularity, copies will be inferred when there is a one year gap of survival. For example, if one has number 24 of 1641 and number 30 of 1643, then the year 1642 will also be inferred. A gap of more than one year will not be inferred.

Variant Issues

A comparison of multiple surviving copies of a newspaper issue can reveal that these are different editions, or variants. There are several different categories of variants. Some variants were published as a result of the late arrival of additional news. If a publisher was expecting a report to arrive imminently, they might leave a blank space on the issue, but start the printing process before the news arrived. When the late report did come in, the printing process would be halted and the report inserted; this might cause other reports to be moved around, or replaced with the use of smaller type.

If the publisher decided to make significant editorial changes during the printing process, variants contain more drastic differences. The arrival of several new reports, or information which reduced the value or interest of reports already set, could prompt a publisher to delete advertisements, or even less important news reports, and change the structural order of the newspaper. These variations are almost always found on the last page, the reverse side of newspapers published as a single sheet. In these cases the front side is almost always identical. An interesting aspect of this work was inspecting a volume of newspapers now located in university library of Uppsala, marked in pencil “dubbel”, indicating that these were separated out from the main Stockholm collection as duplicates and gifted to the library in Uppsala. In fact a number of these turn out to be variants, as can be confirmed by an examination of the reverse side. This, it is worth remarking, is not a difference that would be revealed by either of the customary processes of fingerprinting.<sup>14</sup>

A third category consists of variant issues with identical reports, but a different typesetting. This might indicate that an issue was produced on two different presses, and set by two compositors, which would leave minor differences in the spelling of certain words. The final category of variants consists of misprints: issues which were printed with a serious error in dating or title, which would be corrected mid-way through printing. The existence of such variants was first revealed by Folke Dahl, but his essay in Dutch Corantos concentrates entirely on the first and second categories, which he describes as stop-press news. The third and fourth categories, important especially as print runs expanded, were not discussed.<sup>15</sup> Variants comprise an important feature of this bibliography, and each variant is presented as an individual record. The first variant includes a full list of the places of correspondence and details of advertisements and public announcements. The second variant, instead of repeating these reports, contains instead a statement describing the nature of the identified difference.

Special Issues

The periodicity of newspapers tied publishers to a particular rhythm of publication. For most newspapermen in the seventeenth century, this was a weekly or bi-weekly schedule. This meant that publishers were often a few days behind when reporting a big scoop, leaving the newspaper less competitive in comparison to topical pamphlet or broadsheet publications which could be rushed off the press. In response to this dilemma newspaper publishers issued additional editions of their newspaper. These special issues often concerned news of military engagements, the deaths of notable statesmen or royalty, and other extraordinary or unexpected events. Special issues usually contained only one or a small number of reports, and were shorter than regular issues of the newspaper. While they could be presented in the same lay-out as the normal edition, the printer often drew attention to the news with large headlines and accentuated typesetting. All special issues are included in the bibliographical lists. Some include a date of publication, but others do not. Special issues without a date are given an inferred date.

Illegal Reprints

Opportunistic printers throughout the Low Countries frequently reprinted other newspapers. This was a profitable but illicit activity, and newspaper publishers like Abraham Casteleyn and Joannes Naeranus repeatedly complained of the damage done to their business by illegal reprints.<sup>16</sup> Some of these reprints have survived; they are often found in the same collection as the original. Illegal reprints come in various forms: some are almost identical to the original in content and design—reprints could even include a copy of the woodcut emblem used by the newspaper. Other reprints do not aim to copy the original as closely, and include different news reports. Whereas some reprints pretend to be published by the licensed newspaper publisher, others state plainly that they are “copied after the original”.

These illicit reprints are included in the bibliographical lists. They are sorted within the list of the original issues, and placed in their respective chronological place. The reprints can be identified by the notice “copy” in square brackets at the end of their title.

Facsimiles

Facsimiles and microfilm copies are not included in the bibliography. A few seventeenth-century newspapers were reproduced in the nineteenth century. Facsimiles of the first issue of the Weeckelijcke Courante van Europa (1656) and the sixty-ninth issue of the Ghendtsche Posttydingen (1667) are commonly found in libraries and personal collections. A nineteenth-century reprint, with new reports and editorial commentary, was also made of the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant of 2 August 1667. This copy is frequently mixed in collections with authentic seventeenth-century issues of the tri-weekly Haarlem newspaper.

Note on Call Numbers

Call numbers are provided for newspaper issues which are not easily found in any catalogue. This is particularly pertinent to newspapers which survive in archives, and which have not been separated from volumes of correspondence. Such call numbers are listed directly after the library code, separated by a gap.

Some institutions hold the majority or all of their newspapers under one call number or series. These are listed below, rather than in the main body of bibliography. Unless otherwise stated in the bibliography, newspapers with the following library codes can be found here.

Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c.

Amsterdam, 1618–1669

Around eighty years ago librarians in Stockholm discovered a huge cache of previously neglected early news sheets and pamphlets. Among them was a single half-sheet, undated, but judging by the contents published on 14 June 1618. This consisted of four news reports, set on one side of the sheet only. It was printed in a black letter type-face; the news reports were set in two columns on one side of a folio leaf measuring close to 30 centimetres in height and 20 centimetres in width. Above the two columns the issue read: Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c. The significance of this discovery was immediately recognised by Swedish bibliographer Folke Dahl who had been given the task of examining the newspaper horde: for this was (and still remains) the earliest surviving example of a Dutch newspaper.

The Amsterdam Courante uyt Italien is one of the most renowned Dutch newspapers of the seventeenth century. Since the discovery of the earliest issue of 14 June 1618 in Stockholm in the 1930s the Courante has held the title of the “first Dutch newspaper”.<sup>1</sup> For all this, it is by no means certain that the Courante was indeed the first Dutch newspaper. By February 1619 a second Amsterdam newspaper, published by Broer Jansz (1579–1652), had also appeared.<sup>2</sup> This newspaper, known from 1629 as the Tijdinghen uyt verscheide Quartieren, resembled the Courante in its design and format, likewise published with double columns on a half-sheet folio leaf. Since the survival of both newspapers is so erratic in these first years, it is impossible to say which newspaper was the first to appear; it is likely that the two did so around the same time.

The advent of the periodical press in Amsterdam was encouraged by the rapid growth of the Amsterdam book trade and the city’s commercial infrastructure. In the early seventeenth century the Dutch Republic was fast emerging as the information capital of Calvinist Europe. As tensions in the Holy Roman Empire and the Low Countries increased throughout the 1610s, Calvinist leaders and exiles looked towards the print shops and news writers of Amsterdam to supply much needed publicity for their cause. The first two newspaper publishers had both previously worked as news writers in the army of Maurice,

Prince of Orange, the chief proponent of a militant foreign policy in the Dutch Republic. The two papers did much to broadcast the distressing conditions of Protestants in Bohemia and the Holy Roman Empire, building the case for intervention and renewed warfare against the Habsburgs. In this context, it seems virtually certain that both the Courante and the Tijdinghen were first published during this febrile period, sometime between 1615 and 1618.

The Courante and the Tijdinghen followed similar paths in their design, structure, and day of publication. Up to the 1630s the two titles would compete against one another in the Amsterdam news market; hereafter they were joined by several other newspapers. As competition in the news trade intensified, it became ever more obvious that the Courante enjoyed a significant advantage over its chief rival, presenting superior content and enjoying wider commercial appeal. The Courante was a source of inspiration for other newspapermen in the Dutch Republic, the Southern Netherlands and England. Until the 1650s the Courante was truly the leading newspaper of its day. The title Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c. would resonate too: the majority of seventeenth-century Dutch newspapers would style themselves as Couranten; it became, in effect, a brand name. The word Courante would become synonymous with “newspaper”. The modern Dutch word for newspaper, Krant, derives directly from Courante.

The Courante uyt Italien was published until 1669, when it was merged into the Amsterdamsche Courant.<sup>3</sup> A total of 1,156 issues of the Courante have survived, including eleven special issues and fifty-two variants. These issues are primarily found in three overlapping collections: in Stockholm (316 issues), The Hague (460 issues), and Paris (320 issues). Stray issues and smaller runs of the newspaper have survived in close to twenty other collections. The vast majority of surviving issues date from before 1650. The survival rate of the Courante up to 1650 is 62%, whereas the survival rate is only 15% for the last two decades of production, between 1651 to 1669. The newspaper has survived in a near-complete run between 1626–1643, a remarkable feat when compared to its rivals from the same period.<sup>4</sup>

Until 1619 the newspaper was undated, and contained no imprint information. On 15 May 1619 the newspaper was stated to have been printed by Joris Veseler (c. 1589–1624), located at the Zuiderkerk, “inde Hoop” (in the Hope).<sup>5</sup> On 28 August it was revealed that the Courante was printed by Veseler for “the courantier in the army of the Prince of Orange”, living at the bourse, across the central Dam square, in the “gecroonden Hoedt” (crowned hat).<sup>6</sup> This courantier, as the imprint on 17 October 1620 exposed, was Caspar van Hilten (?–c. 1623). In all likelihood Van Hilten came from Germany, given that his son Jan was described in 1626 as “a young man from Hamburg”.<sup>7</sup> After his career as a news writer in the army of Maurice, Caspar settled in Amsterdam. Setting up shop at the recently-established bourse in the later 1610s, he devoted the remainder of his career to the business of serial printed news. From at least 1620 Van Hilten published a French translation of his newspaper, the Courant d'Italie et d'Almaigne, published in the same style and format as the Courante uyt Italien.<sup>8</sup> The Courant d'Italie & d'Almaigne is the first French newspaper known to have been published in Europe; the first newspaper to be published in France, the Paris Gazette, appeared over a decade later in 1631.

The Courante uyt Italien was published weekly, like most early newspapers established in the Holy Roman Empire and the Low Countries. From 1618 until at least 1624 it did not appear on a fixed day of the week. Most commonly the Courante was published on Fridays or Saturdays, but issues were also printed on Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays. Only in 1624 did the date of publication settle on Saturday. At the same time Broer Jansz's Tijdinghen uyt verscheide Quartieren settled on Saturday too, after a similarly erratic schedule of publication.

The choice to publish the Courante uyt Italien as a half-sheet folio leaf was bold. Newspapers in the Holy Roman Empire were presented in the same style as news pamphlets: usually a sheet or a half-sheet of paper folded twice to make a pamphlet of eight or four pages. The half-sheet folio style of the early Dutch newspapers was certainly more efficient in its use of paper. The pamphlet format required broader margins because of the folds, whereas the unfolded sheet of the Courante could be filled to the extremities of the margins. Pamphlet newspapers often included elaborate title-pages or woodcut illustrations, taking up further valuable space. The Courante, with its modest header and tightly-packed reports, was potentially far more economical to produce, even if the result was rather utilitarian in appearance. The Tijdinghen of Broer Jansz adopted the same format as the Courante, and from 1620 onwards both newspapers contained reports printed on both sides of the folio sheets. By the later 1620s most issues of the two newspapers contained around 1,700–2,000 words. In comparison, the folded octavo pamphlets of Abraham Verhoeven's Antwerp Nieuwe Tijdinghen, also composed of half a sheet, contained around 800–1,000 words per issue.<sup>9</sup> Throughout the seventeenth century most Dutch newspapers, especially in Amsterdam, would adopt the format pioneered by the two early Amsterdam newspapers. As the periodical press matured, and the content of Dutch newspapers expanded, the half-sheet folios became ever more tightly packed. By the end of the seventeenth century, with the help of ever smaller typefaces, Dutch newspapers would routinely accommodate around 3,500–4,000 words per issue—still using only a half-sheet of paper.

A distinct disadvantage of the half-sheet folio format was the disincentive to gather together sequential issues. Publishers of folded pamphlet newspapers, such as Abraham Verhoeven in Antwerp, encouraged their customers to collect and bind together the issues of their newspaper at the end of each year. For this purpose they often provided successive signature statements, signing issue 1 “A”, issue 2 “B”, and so forth. The majority of newspapers also adopted a sequential numbering at the top of each issue, to guide their customers and bookbinders. The smaller format of the pamphlet newspapers, together with these binding aides, have done much to preserve many early newspapers as complete runs in bound volumes. Van Hilten and Broer Jansz were less concerned with marketing their newspapers as collectables. The Courante and the Tijdinghen were unnumbered until 1629, and folio newspapers never contained signature statements. The flimsy folios were economical to produce but they were far less likely to have been preserved.

The enigmatic Caspar van Hilten died sometime between June 1622 and March 1623. From at least 13 March 1623 the Courante uyt Italien was published by Jan van Hilten (c. 1602–1655), Caspar's son, who had taken over his father's shop on the bourse.<sup>10</sup> Towards the end of 1625 Van Hilten moved premises, publishing from a shop around the corner on the Beursstraat, the “twee vergulde Wapeninghen” (two gilded weapon-rings). In 1628 he changed the shop sign to the “Geborduyrde Hanschoen” (embroid-dered glove). Van Hilten would be located at the centre of the Amsterdam news market for the rest of his life. Future competitors would establish their own shops close to Van Hilten's premises. The courantiers François Lieshout and Mathijs van Meininga were located at or around the corner from the bourse; Joost Broersz was in the adjacent Pijlsteeg stretching east from the Dam square; Jan Jacobsz Bouman on "the water", (now the Damrak) the canal stretching north from the Dam square where one could find many other bookshops; and Van Hilten's closest rival, Broer Jansz, would move in 1621 to the Nieuwezijds Achterburgwal (now the Spuistraat), a minute's walk west from the Dam square.

Jan was only twenty years old when he became the new courantier, but he embraced the position with fervour and dedication. Jan would have been too young to enjoy significant experience as a field-reporter like his father or his competitor Broer Jansz, but Jan devoted his efforts to news writing and news gathering. For the first decade of his career, Van Hilten occupied himself only with the news trade. His other extant publications from the later 1620s and early 1630s are all occasional news pamphlets and illustrated broadsheets. Van Hilten worked closely with the engraver-publishers Claes Jansz Visscher (1587–1652) and Crispijn (II) van de Pas (c. 1597–1670), producing broadsheet illustrated news accounts as supplements to the weekly news reports of the Courante. It seems that Van Hilten continued to publish his father's French Courant d'Italie & d'Almaigne—at his death in 1655 the burgomasters of Amsterdam noted that Van Hilten was still publishing a French newspaper. Yet not a single copy of the Courant d'Italie & d'Almaigne or any other French newspaper published by Jan van Hilten has survived. In 1633 Van Hilten was also responsible for the publication of a series of English newsbooks.<sup>11</sup> After the suspension of serial news publication in England in October 1632, Van Hilten started to produce English newsbooks for sale in London. Three issues of this series have survived, dated from February and March 1633, but it is likely that Van Hilten continued this profitable transnational operation throughout the 1630s—London newsbooks remained banned until 1638.

The Courante uyt Italien was produced by a variety of printers. Unlike Broer Jansz, the Van Hiltens concentrated their efforts on the publication of their newspaper, rather than its printing. Joris Veseler, the first printer of the newspaper, was a Southern Netherlandish émigré who established himself by 1618 in the Amsterdam book trade as a specialist in current affairs and ephemera.<sup>12</sup> Veseler printed the first English newspapers for the Amsterdam publisher Pieter van den Keere, whose Corrant out of Italy and Germany &c. was based on content from both Van Hilten's and Jansz's newspapers.<sup>13</sup> Veseler's experience with the printing of Van Hilten's Courante undoubtedly prompted him to print this English translation in a similar format and style. Veseler also had a penchant for more controversial works. He produced a variety of anonymous Remonstrant tracts at a time when Remonstrant printing was suppressed after the recent conclusion of the Synod of Dordt and the arrest and execution of Johan van Oldenbarnevelt.<sup>14</sup> In January 1621 Veseler was interrogated by the authorities for the printing of two political pamphlets, the Morgen-wecker and the Historie vande gevangenisse ende executie vande gewesen Advocaet Barnevelt.<sup>15</sup> He admitted to printing 1,000 copies of the first, a radical piece of polemic against the Prince of Orange written by Remonstrant firebrand Henricus Slatius (1585–1623); and 1,250 copies of the second, a collection of letters and prayers written by Oldenbarnevelt accompanied by an analytical narrative of his imprisonment and execution, including his final words and a letter to his family.<sup>16</sup> Given his ready and detailed confession Veseler got off lightly with a 200 gulden fine, and publication of the Courante uyt Italien continued without interruption.

After the death of Joris Veseler in 1624 his widow Aechjen Jacobs (c. 1592–?) took over as printer of the Courante uyt Italien. In 1628 she married the young printer Jan Fredericksz Stam (c. 1602–1667), who moved in with her near the Zuiderkerk, and was from then on listed as printer of the newspaper.<sup>17</sup> Stam, a specialist in bibles and English puritan print, was succeeded in June 1645 by his step-son Jacob Veseler (c. 1614–?), who printed the Courante until February 1646. At that point Jan van Hilten set up a press in his own shop, perhaps managed and operated there by Jacob Veseler.

In their first decade of publication the two rival Amsterdam newspapers presented their content in a similar form. The first page of their newspapers would be given up to datelined news reports. During the 1620s and early 1630s Van Hilten's news network was structured around reports from Venice, Vienna, Prague and Cologne. The German cities of Frankfurt, Breslau, Leipzig and Regensburg also appear frequently. Van Hilten maintained good connections in the Dutch army, and covered the campaigns against the Habsburgs extensively. Someway down on the second page the datelined news reports gave way to a section without datelines or headers, divided from the previous content by a distinctive line break.<sup>18</sup> This "news below the line" was used by Van Hilten and Jansz to present to their readers a miscellany of reports derived from local and sometimes oral sources. While the reports "above the line" offered by Van Hilten and Jansz in the 1620s were often derived from the same sources, the reports "below the line" contained more significant variations.

A substantial transformation took place around the early 1630s, when the Courante uyt Italien effectively established itself as a leader in the Dutch news market. Van Hilten's news network expanded rapidly, and the overall word count of the Courante increased to close to 2,500 words per issue. Now his readers were offered regular reports from Antwerp, Hamburg, Paris, Lübeck, and Stettin. Cologne and Venice remained staples of the weekly Courante, but the centre of gravity of Van Hilten's network shifted to Northern and Western Europe. While Broer Jansz maintained a news network concentrated more on France, the Italian peninsula and Southern Germany, Van Hilten relied purely on Venice for his Southern European news. Van Hilten's network was remarkably efficient too: out of 52 issues of the Courante published in 1630, 51 issues opened with a report from Venice.

In the later 1630s Van Hilten became one of the first newspapermen to offer close coverage of the eruption and development of the English Civil Wars. Unlike his rival Broer Jansz, who relied on occasional reports from London, Van Hilten tapped into a wide network of news from English provincial towns. Almost every single issue of the Courante of the 1640s featured news from London and further reports from Plymouth, Exeter, Gloucester, York, and Newcastle, places which had scarcely featured in the Dutch newspapers up to this point. By the end of the 1640s, they had become a staple of the Dutch news industry.

From the early 1620s the Courante and the Tijdinghen provided a significant additional service for their customers: they began to print book advertisements from their colleagues in the book trade. These were always located at the end of the fourth column of news on the second page. This pioneering feature was welcomed by the Dutch book trade, albeit gradually. In the 1620s we see only a few advertisements placed in the Courante: one in 1627, four in 1628, seven in 1629. But from the early 1630s the number of advertisements increased rapidly, and by the end of the decade almost every single extant issue of the Courante featured at least one. Comparing the advertisements placed in the Courante and the Tijdinghen in the 1630s and 1640s, it becomes clear that Van Hilten's newspaper was patronised by a wider section of the book trade.<sup>19</sup> Many booksellers who advertised regularly in the Courante never placed copy in the Tijdinghen. It is clear also that Van Hilten enjoyed national appeal: while the majority of advertisers were local Amsterdam publishers, booksellers from across the country, from Middelburg to Franeker, advertised in the Courante.

The sophistication of Van Hilten's publishing strategies are also evident from the survival of fifty-two variant issues of the Courante uyt Italien. The overlapping collections in Stockholm, The Hague and Paris reveal that Van Hilten used at least two printing presses for the production of the Courante, with two different compositors working on the paper every week. The variants also demonstrate that Van Hilten pioneered a "stop-press" publishing technique, often halting the production process of the Courante to insert late incoming reports.<sup>20</sup> More often than not, such reports came from England. The "stop-press" technique would become a common aspect of the newspaper trade throughout Europe, but Jan van Hilten was one of the first (if not the first) to experiment with this process.

Van Hilten's success in the news trade encouraged him to diversify his investments. The first extant work published by Van Hilten distinct from the news business was published in 1640, a popular description of the Dutch herring trade by Meinert Allertsz Semeyns (c. 1608–1652).<sup>21</sup> Advertisements placed by Van Hilten in his newspaper reveal that he was already diversifying his publications in the early 1630s: on 17 September 1633 he advertised for an English bible. This bible is no longer extant, so the advertisement constitutes the only record of its existence.<sup>22</sup> By the 1640s Van Hilten was publishing a variety of histories, plays, literature, and works of architecture, medicine, jurisprudence and mathematics. Around the mid-1640s Van Hilten also published a second newspaper, the Extraordinaire Advijzen op Donderdagh, a Thursday weekly to complement his established Saturday venture.<sup>23</sup> By this point the Amsterdam news market was expanding to its greatest heights, and Van Hilten was determined not to fall behind.

Newspaper men always had to keep a wary eye that the contents of their papers would not cause offence, and here the Courante uyt Italien was also an unwilling pioneer, being the first Dutch newspaper to receive recorded reprimands for its contents. The States General complained to the magistrates of Amsterdam after Van Hilten had published a report in his Courante on 1 July 1645 which stated that the Duke of Orleans had asked Stadhouder Frederick Henry for greater assistance against Spain.<sup>24</sup> The States General took affront at this report, given that they intended to deploy the Stadhouder's new troops in the Sound, rather than in the Habsburg Netherlands. A second complaint made against the Courante was to follow in 1658, this time by George Downing, the ambassador of the English Commonwealth. Downing was aghast that an issue of the Courante, dated 28 December 1658, had included a report from London which claimed that Commonwealth militias had dug up the recently buried remains of Lord Protector Oliver Cromwell in pursuit of their demand for unpaid salaries.<sup>25</sup> On both occasions the magistrates of Amsterdam, who received the complaints, paid little attention to the protests.

A more serious disruption to the Courante uyt Italien came in 1654. In this year the burgomasters of Amsterdam decided to regulate the production of newspapers in the city.<sup>26</sup> They instructed the four remaining courantiers (two publishing on Tuesdays, and two, including Van Hilten, on Saturdays) to share publication.<sup>27</sup> Henceforth, instead of competing on the same day, the four newspapers would appear fortnightly in alternating weeks. Thus the Courante uyt Italien shared Saturdays with its former rival the Tijdinghen; the two serials also shared the annual numbering sequence. One year all the issues of the Courante took the even numbers, and all the issues of the Tijdinghen the odd. The lively competition between the two newspapers had come to a sudden and innocuous end.

Jan van Hilten died in November 1655, when the ownership of his newspaper was thrown into dispute. Van Hilten's wife had died in 1639, and his two eldest children had passed away in 1628 and 1640. Van Hilten had not remarried, and was supported only by his sole surviving child, Celia. She had married the young bookseller Nicolaes Jacobsz (c. 1631–?) on 3 September 1655, two months before Jan van Hilten's death.<sup>28</sup> Jacobsz and Celia wished to take over the Courante uyt Italien together with the rest of Van Hilten's business, but the burgomasters of Amsterdam had other plans. On 10 December they appointed the printer and bookseller Otto Barentsz Smient (1614–1689) as the new publisher of the Courante uyt Italien.<sup>29</sup> Smient, son of publisher Barent Otsz, came from an established family of printers and booksellers active in Amsterdam and Dordrecht.<sup>30</sup> He was an experienced publisher and a member of the St Luke's guild of Amsterdam since 1635. Smient was located on the Reguliersbreestraat, a little further south from the heart of the Amsterdam book trade. Up to 1655 he had occupied himself largely with a trade in bibles, history and literature, mostly published in smaller formats, catering for the large market for middling vernacular literature and devotional print in the Dutch Republic. After he was appointed, Smient concentrated more on his work as courantier, and his productivity beyond the news market diminished. On Mondays he also published a weekly French newspaper, as Jan van Hilten had done: the Nouvelles Ordinaires (from 1666 known as the Gazette Ordinaire d'Amsterdam).<sup>31</sup>

Smient's experience and reputation are likely to have undermined young Jacobsz's chances of selection for the position of courantier. Yet Jacobsz did not relinquish easily what he regarded as his familial right as son-in-law of Jan van Hilten. Within weeks of Smient's appointment, Jacobsz had moved to the nearby town of Weesp, where he promptly established a print shop and published a rival newspaper.<sup>32</sup> This, the Weesp Courante uyt Italien ende Duytschlant, &c. (1656–1660), would haunt Smient for at least four years. Jacobsz published his rival Courante every Saturday, transporting copies to Amsterdam using the recently opened canal between Amsterdam and Weesp.

Smient had no means to silence Jacobsz, who had been welcomed by the local authorities in Weesp, and he could do little to prevent the Weesp Courante infringing on his market and stealing his customers. Jacobsz presented his Courante in a near-identical form as Smient; the only notable difference was the assertion by Smient in the imprint that he was the “authorised courantier” of Amsterdam. For his part Jacobsz emphasised in the imprint of his newspaper that he was the “son-in-law of the late Jan van Hilten”. Jacobsz published the Weesp Courante till at least September 1660. It is uncertain how badly Smient’s sales were affected by the rivalry, but the impact must have been considerable. The Weesp Courante, despite its outsider status, was quickly used by several Amsterdam booksellers for their book advertisements—an indication that they may have preferred Jacobsz to Smient as the successor of Van Hilten.

Smient’s news network was remarkably different from that of the late Jan van Hilten. Smient cultivated a network of correspondents concentrated on the Mediterranean, Paris, London and the Baltic. There were few German reports to be found in Smient’s Courante, but instead frequent dispatches from Madrid, the North African coast, Naples, Lisbon and Genoa; locations which had rarely appeared during Van Hilten’s period as publisher. Smient regularly offered two reports from Paris, and often three from London. The overall content of the newspaper increased under Smient’s tenure: Smient introduced smaller roman and cursive typefaces, and by the end of the 1660s most issues of the Courante contained around 3,000 words. From the early 1660s the newspaper also featured geographical headers, grouping reports under different sections (a fashion introduced in The Hague by Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht and in Haarlem by Abraham Casteleyn). In 1662 Smient also added a small woodcut of the coat of arms of Amsterdam, positioned at the top-left corner alongside the title. He was the first Amsterdam courantier to do so.

During his time as publisher of the Courante uyt Italien Smient ran into conflict with the bookseller Cornelis Jansz Swoll (c. 1622–1687), who had published a French newspaper, La Gazette d’Amsterdam, on Thursdays from 1662 onwards.<sup>33</sup> In 1670 Swoll began to publish his newspaper twice a week, on Tuesdays and Thursdays. This expansion had come too soon, and according to testimony from both Smient and Swoll the market for French newspapers had become saturated. In 1673 the burgomasters of Amsterdam resolved that the two men would share publication, restricting Swoll to Thursdays only. However, shortly afterwards the competitors came to an agreement: Smient would stop publishing his Gazette Ordinaire for an annual fee of 200 gulden paid to him by Swoll, allowing Swoll to continue La Gazette d’Amsterdam as a bi-weekly publication. In return Smient also promised to divert his correspondents’ letters to Swoll.

Smient remained in the position of courantier when the Courante uyt Italien was merged at the start of 1670 into the Amsterdamsche Courant, appearing every fortnight on Saturday under the title of the Amsterdamse Saturdaghse Courant.<sup>34</sup>

NB.

Because of the irregular date of publication of the Courante uyt Italien during the first decade of printing and lack of numbering I have not inferred any issues up to 1629.

On 10 July 1627 Jan van Hilten published an issue of his newspaper using the form of title employed by Broer Jansz for his Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren: “Wt Breslauen 17. Iunij.” I cannot establish why Van Hilten would have chosen to do so, or whether this was a printing mistake by Aechjen Jacobs, the printer.

The title of the Courante uyt Italien was subject to frequent minor changes. It was variably titled: Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c. (1618–1623), Courante uyt Italien en Duytschlandt, &c. (1623–1625), Courante uyt Italien en Duytsch-landt, &c. (1625–1628), Courante uyt Italien ende Duytschlandt, &c. (1628–1631, 1632–1647), Courante uyt Italien ende Duytschlandt &c. (1631–1632), Courante uyt Italien ende Duytschlant, &c. (1648–1656), Courante uyt Italien ende Duytslant, &c. (1657–1662), Courante uyt Italien ende Duytslant &c. (1662), Courante uyt Italien en Duytslant, &c. (1663–1664), Courante uyt Italien en Duytslant (1665–1669), Courante uyt Italien en Duytslant &c. (1669).

Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren Amsterdam, 1619–1671

Broer Jansz (1579–1652) was one of the most prolific newsmen of the seventeenth century.<sup>1</sup> He was a true pioneer, an entrepreneur who stood at the centre of a burgeoning commercial market for printed news. His long career spanned most of the Eighty Years' War—he would see the Dutch state rise from its humble beginnings as a struggling rebel remnant to the first rank of Europe's commercial powers. Jansz's life would follow a similar path: he worked his way steadily through the book trade as a journeyman, engraver, compositor, printer and publisher. At the end of his life, aged seventy-three, Jansz had stamped his legacy on the Dutch news market, and was the proud head of a family of courantiers: his son, son-in-law and grandson would follow him into the newspaper business.<sup>2</sup>

It is uncertain when Broer Jansz first became a newspaper publisher. While the honour of “first courantier” in the Low Countries is currently awarded to Caspar van Hilten (?–c. 1623), whose Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c. survives from June 1618 onwards, it is highly likely that Jansz started his newspaper around the same time, if not a few years earlier.<sup>3</sup> The earliest surviving issue of Jansz's newspaper, then untitled, dates from 10 February 1619.<sup>4</sup> From 1629 the newspaper would be known as the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren. Prior to this date the issues were headed by the dateline of the first news report, usually from Rome or Venice: “Wt Romen den 18. Mey” or “Wt Venetien den 6. Februarij, 1621”. Jansz's Tijdinghen was published as a half-sheet folio, from 1620 onwards always printed on both sides—exactly the same style as Van Hilten's Courante uyt Italien. The news reports were set in double columns in a black letter typeface. The issues were unnumbered until 1629.

In the early 1600s Broer Jansz was like his competitor Van Hilten a field-reporter and news writer in the army of Stadhouder Maurice, son of Prince William of Orange. Jansz's newspapers always stated proudly that they were printed by Broer Jansz, “former courantier in the army of His Princely Excellency”. Jansz started his career as an apprentice and compositor in the print shop of Willem Jansz van Veen (fl. 1577–1604), an Amsterdam publisher specialising in news pamphlets and current affairs.<sup>5</sup> Van Veen had good connections with the Dutch army; perhaps he helped Broer Jansz launch his career as a news writer. By 1603 Jansz had opened his own print shop in Amsterdam, producing a variety of news pamphlets documenting the progress of the army of Maurice against Spanish forces. Not content with receiving reports from the front-line, Jansz spent most of the summer of 1604 accompanying the Prince's army; upon his return to Amsterdam he wrote, printed and published an account of the campaign, entitled Journal ofte dach-register van't principaelste in Vlaenderen geschiet, sedert den 25. april tot den 15. september 1604.<sup>6</sup> Jansz would retain a penchant for eyewitness accounts. One of the earliest extant issues of the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren is a special issue describing the execution of Johan van Oldenbarnevelt, former Grand Pensionary of Holland, on 13 May 1619.<sup>7</sup> Jansz had travelled down from Amsterdam to attend the execution in The Hague, and he most likely printed his account the following day. He promised his readers that he would notify them of further details in his newspaper the coming Friday.

In the early 1600s Jansz's business prospered in the burgeoning Amsterdam book world. While the news trade would always demand his greatest attention, he was soon diversifying, printing almanacs, song books, plays, devotional literature, travel books, wedding poems and ordinances. He had become a specialist of cheap print, acquir-

Broer Jansz issued at least two editions. See also the variant: *Verhael vanden doot des Advocaets van Hollandt, Johan van Olden-Barnevelt, hoe hy op den 13. ing a reputation for quality ephemera. Jansz worked for numerous publishers in Amsterdam, printing for Hendrick Barentsz, Jacob Pietersz Wachter, Claes Jansz Visscher, Jan Evertsz Cloppenburgh, Hendrick Laurensz, Pieter Walschaert, Cornelis Lodewijcksz vander Plasse, Michiel Colijn, Abraham de Wees, Theunis Jacobsz Lootsman, Jan Jacobsz Schipper, Jan Bruyningh, Gerrit Jansz, Jacob Lescaille and Jan Marcusz. He also worked occasionally for publishers further afield, including Hillebrant Jacobsz (I) van Wouw (in The Hague), Vincent (I) Casteleyn (in Haarlem) and Zacharias Heyns (in Zwolle). Jansz's expertise was recognised by the local authorities, and he was appointed as stadsdrukker by the magistrates in 1614, and later as printer of disputations for the Athenaeum Illustre (the illustrious school, founded in 1632).<sup>8</sup> That a printer of everyday vernacular print could be considered for such positions in the greatest city of the Dutch Republic suggests that the market in Dutch books was recognised for what it was: the cornerstone of the publishing industry. Overall, Jansz produced at least 450 publications throughout his career—many more are undoubtedly lost.

By the later 1610s Jansz was exceptionally well-equipped to publish a newspaper. He enjoyed connections in the army; he was well regarded by the local authorities; he could rely on a wide network of booksellers and publishers who would distribute his publications; and he had a true nose for valuable news reports. Broer Jansz moved ever closer to the centre of the Amsterdam book trade during the 1610s. He moved shop frequently, occupying no fewer than five premises up to 1615, most of which were located in the cramped north-western neighbourhood of Amsterdam. Between 1615 and 1619 he was located on the Nieuwezijdsdolk; in 1619 he moved to the Sint Nicolaasstraat, next to the “vergulden Os” (gilded ox), before settling in May 1621 on the Nieuwezijds Achterburgwal (now the Spuistraat), in the “Silvere Can” (silver jug). With these three relocations, steadily occupying shops in grander streets, Jansz had established himself securely at the heart of the Amsterdam news trade. He would remain in his shop on the Nieuwezijds Achterburgwal, a stone's throw behind the city hall, for the rest of his career.

The Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren appeared once a week, initially on Fridays or Saturdays, but throughout 1619–1621 also sometimes on Mondays, Tuesdays or Wednesdays. From the end of 1624 the newspaper was commonly published on Saturdays, with fewer irregularities. From 1654 onwards the Tijdinghen appeared fortnightly, after the burgomasters of Amsterdam introduced a stringent regulation concerning the production of newspapers. Henceforth the newspaper shared publication with the Courante uyt Italien, also adopting a shared numbering system throughout the year.

Early in his newspaper career Jansz also offered English and French translations of his Tijdinghen. In 1621 he was responsible for a weekly English Corante, or, newes from Italy and Germanie, drawn together largely from reports published in the Tijdinghen.<sup>9</sup> It is likely that this series was short-lived, halted by the publication in London of Nathaniel Bourne and Nathaniel Butter's series of newsbooks in the early 1620s, which brought to an end not only Broer Jansz's English newspaper, but also a parallel venture by the Amsterdam bookseller Pieter van den Keere. Notwithstanding the brevity of their English series (no issues survive after 1621), Broer Jansz can be named, alongside Pieter van den Keere, as the first publishers of English newspapers. From at least 1635 Broer Jansz was also responsible for a weekly French newspaper, the Nouvelles de divers Quartiers.<sup>10</sup> The Nouvelles appeared on Mondays, and contained virtually the same news reports as printed in the Tijdinghen on Saturdays. Only advertisements placed by booksellers in the Tijdinghen were left out of the Nouvelles. With this French venture Jansz seems to have targeted partly French readers at home, but also the French market in the Southern Netherlands and France, in a similar fashion to later Huguenot courantières in the Dutch Republic.

A total of 650 issues of the Tijdinghen have survived (including seven variants and four special issues). The survival rate of the newspaper, at 28%, is much poorer than its rival Courante uyt Italien (with a 50% survival rate), but the Tijdinghen survive largely in the same collections as the Courante. Most issues can be found in Stockholm (328 issues), Paris (129 issues), and The Hague (61 issues), with stray issues in over twenty smaller collections. The fact that the Tijdinghen has often been preserved in the same places as issues of the Courante suggests that the two newspapers were often read alongside one another. The statesman-poet Pieter Cornelisz Hooft commented in a letter to his brother-in-law Joost Baak on 25 August 1631 that “yesterday my brother-in-law Bartelot sent me the tidings of Veseler [the printer of the Courante], which are more agreeable than those of Broer [Jansz], which came from you".<sup>11</sup>

Hooft enjoyed comparing the two newspapers for the variety of their content. Broer Jansz did have a remarkably different network of correspondents than his closest rivals Caspar and Jan van Hilten. Whereas the Van Hiltens concentrated their efforts on a North European network of news sources, Jansz's Tijdinghen offered a selection of reports drawn largely from Southern and Central European news centres. Rome, Venice, Vienna, Prague, Switzerland, Strasbourg and Paris were staples in the Tijdinghen on a regular basis. Jansz cultivated a more extensive network of correspondents in Italy, France and the Holy Roman Empire than the Van Hiltens, but he fell behind in the 1640s when news from the English Civil Wars came to dominate public attention in the Dutch Republic. Jansz did continue to maintain good connections with the Dutch army, and his coverage of the campaigns and sieges of Stadhouder Frederick Henry was always comprehensive.

Broer Jansz was identified by contemporaries as the most partisan voice of the Dutch news trade. He was frequently singled out for criticism from the Southern Netherlands, generally bearing the brunt of mockery by fellow newsman Abraham Verhoeven in Antwerp. In 1626 Verhoeven ridiculed Broer Jansz for printing false news of the victory of the King of Denmark against the Imperial army. Verhoeven, impersonating the Amsterdam courantier, lamented that "my press and type were already prepared, to print the victory of the Dane".<sup>12</sup> An anonymous Southern pamphlet from 1638, Den Ghefailleerden Facit, contained a boisterous attack against Broer Jansz's reputation as courantier, mocking Jansz for preferring to print old news of bygone Dutch victories rather than report the latest news of Dutch defeat at the battle of Kallo.<sup>13</sup> Recent scholarly studies largely reiterate seventeenth-century portrayals of Jansz as a "militant Orangist and Calvinist", struggling at times to restrain himself to sober news reporting.<sup>14</sup>

Jansz certainly came from a different milieu than his chief rival Jan van Hilten (c. 1602–1655). Jan, who had taken over the Courante uyt Italien after his father's death around 1623, was more than twenty years younger than Broer Jansz. Unlike Jansz, who had worked his way up through the book trade, Jan van Hilten was a newspaper publisher by the time he was twenty, devoting himself exclusively to news writing and publishing. Jansz, who had grown up during the volatile years of the Twelve Years' Truce and experienced the terrors of war first hand, undoubtedly perceived the world through different eyes.

It does seem that Van Hilten's Courante was more popular with fellow booksellers in the Dutch trade than Jansz's Tijdinghen. From the early 1620s booksellers had started to place notifications for forthcoming publications in the two Amsterdam newspapers. The first recorded advertisement was placed in Jansz's Tijdinghen on 1 March 1621.<sup>15</sup> By the later 1630s the majority of issues of the two Amsterdam weeklies contained one or two booksellers' advertisements. Van Hilten's Courante enjoyed wider patronage from advertising booksellers, many of whom do not have seemed to have advertised in the Tijdinghen.<sup>16</sup>

In 1629 Jansz was in financial trouble, and asked the burgomasters of Amsterdam for permission to auction off some of his stock to restore liquidity.<sup>17</sup> Permission for this auction was granted, though no catalogue of the auction has survived (if one was produced). Afterwards his business seems to have flourished, and he continued to enjoy a prominent position in the Dutch book trade. In 1640 Jansz started a bi-annual book trade catalogue, the Catalogus Universalis, a register of all recently published titles in the Dutch Republic.<sup>18</sup> Booksellers were invited to send Jansz lists of their new titles, which they seem to have done with enthusiasm—while the Catalogus Universalis never came close to including details of every book published in the Dutch Republic, it was supported by a majority of publishers throughout the country, and approximately a quarter of books published throughout the 1640s would feature in the catalogue.<sup>19</sup> Jansz would maintain this venture until his death in October 1652.

18 Jansz, Catalogus Universalis.

19 The fifteen extant issues of the Catalogus Universalis contain together just over 2,000 titles. The USTC currently documents over 9,500 titles published in the Dutch Republic in the 1640s (essentially the decade covered by the catalogues), a figure which includes many genres of books never featured in the Catalogus Universalis, such as academic disputations and ordinances.

Broer Jansz was buried in the Nieuwe Kerk on 21 October 1652. He had clearly been in failing health, because the Amsterdam burgomasters had already appointed Jan Banningh as the new stadsdrukker on 17 October. The Tijdinghen was continued by Jansz's son-in-law, Jan Jacobsz Bouman (?–1671), who had married Jansz's daughter Aeltje in 1640.<sup>20</sup> Bouman, who maintained a shop on “the water” (the modern Damrak), had substantial experience in the newspaper trade as the printer and publisher of the bi-weekly Extra Europische tijdingen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, which appeared in the mid-1640s.<sup>21</sup> It is likely that this venture had been published with the assistance of Broer Jansz; now Bouman came to the rescue of the Jansz family. Broer Jansz's widow, Lijsbeth Philips (c. 1592–1672), declared to the Amsterdam burgomasters in January 1653 that she had no wish to continue the newspaper.<sup>22</sup> Instead, she wished to pass on the position to Bouman, who would bear the costs and enjoy the profits of the venture. The widow asked only that she would be granted by Bouman 200 gulden a year as a pension, and that he would also grant another 200 gulden each year to the heirs of Broer Jansz. It is unclear who these heirs were, but the fact that Bouman consented to his proposal indicates that the profits from the Tijdinghen (by the 1650s) were substantial enough to provide an annual 400 gulden subsidy to the Jansz family. As tribute to the widow of Broer Jansz, Bouman maintained her name on the newspaper rather than his own. Only in 1670, shortly before his death, did Bouman reveal himself to be the de facto proprietor of the venture.

Bouman published the Tijdinghen until his death in January 1671, when the newspaper was merged into the conglomerated Amsterdamsche Courant and Bouman's position as courantier was taken over by Casparus Commelijn (1636–1693).<sup>23</sup> The character of the Tijdinghen had changed noticeably during Bouman's tenure as courantier in the 1650s and 1660s. Bouman maintained a different network of correspondents, and the focus of the newspaper shifted from Jansz's German, Italian and French network to Northern Europe, similar to Jan van Hilten's network of correspondence. In the 1650s and 1660s Bouman presented in the Tijdinghen regular reports from Stockholm, Copenhagen, Danzig, Hamburg, London, Paris, Antwerp, and Brussels; but he also enjoyed good connections with the Iberian Peninsula, offering regular dispatches from Lisbon, Cádiz and Madrid. Meanwhile Italian reports in the Tijdinghen dwindled to a minimum.

Bouman also introduced a new range of typefaces, making more frequent use of a small roman typeface for a variety of news reports. He ensured that the Tijdinghen kept up with developments in the Dutch newspaper trade; the Courante uyt Italien and the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante underwent similar transformations, while the Oprechte Haerlemse Courant had become the new trendsetter in the newspaper market.<sup>24</sup> By Bouman's death Dutch readers were offered an extensive range of reports, increasingly smaller typefaces, and a growing range of advertisements. The courantiers of the final decades of the seventeenth century would be wealthy, established gentlemen, decorous in their appearance. They paid less attention to the printing of their newspapers, which was tasked to their assistants or business partners. By 1700 Broer Jansz, the more humble journalist-printer, would not have fitted in. Yet the grand gentlemen at the end of the century relied more than they might have acknowledged on the imaginative and innovative spirit of Broer Jansz for the newspaper trade in which they made their profits.

NB.

Because of the irregular date of publication of the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren during the first decade of printing and lack of numbering I have not inferred any issues up to 1629.

The spelling of the title of the Tijdinghen was subject to frequent minor changes. Tijdinghen, Tijdingen, Tijdinge, Tijdinghe, Tydingen, Tydinghe, and Tydinge were all used; verscheyde or verscheyden (and in 1630 briefly vele) were also used.

Arnhemsche Courant Arnhem, 1619–1636

Arnhem was the most prominent town in the Dutch state of Gelderland. It was the capital of one of the quarters of the state (the quarter of the Veluwe), and contained the seat of the treasury and the court of the province.<sup>1</sup> Its central location close to the fork of the lower Rhine and the river IJssel endowed the town with strategic military importance, but the city was far removed from the dense urban network of Holland. Only a few thousand people lived here.

In theory, Arnhem was not a natural location for the early publication of a newspaper. Nevertheless, it was the birthplace of the first Dutch newspaper outside of Amsterdam; and of the third-oldest newspaper in the Low Countries. This is all the more astonishing given that at the start of the seventeenth century the Arnhem book trade was of little importance. The first printer to settle in Arnhem was Willem Jansz van Campen. From 1581 to 1589 Van Campen resided in the town in an official capacity as the printer of the States of Gelderland. In 1589 he departed for Amsterdam, leaving Arnhem without a printer once more.<sup>2</sup>

The printer and bookseller Jan Jansz (?–1629) arrived in Arnhem some time before 1595. His first publications date from 1597, and he became printer to the States of Gelderland in 1599.<sup>3</sup> Until his death in 1629 Jansz was the only printer active in the town; on his arrival there was little to indicate that he would play a more prominent role than that of a provincial jobbing printer. Nevertheless, Jan Jansz's ambition, skill and business connections allowed him to build up a significant profile. Between 1597 and 1629 he published at least 216 titles in Dutch, German and Latin.<sup>4</sup> He did good business printing ordinances for the States of Gelderland and the local magistrates, and he engaged in virtually every part of the book trade, publishing historical, classical, literary, geographical, mathematical and theological texts. Jansz made a considerable mark on the Dutch book market. He had works printed for him in Utrecht, Franeker, Dordrecht, Haarlem, Leiden and Amsterdam.<sup>5</sup> Jansz enjoyed especially good relations with the Hondius family in Amsterdam; Jansz's son, Johannes Janssonius (1588–1664) married into the Hondius family and would become one of the most prolific Amsterdam publishers of the Golden Age.<sup>6</sup> In addition, between 1613 and 1625 Jan Jansz owned a paper mill near Arnhem, ensuring a steady supply of printing paper for his business—a necessity for a successful publishing career.<sup>7</sup>

Although Arnhem did not offer a very promising local market, Jan Jansz in other respects possessed all the necessary qualifications for the publication of a newspaper. He had an extensive trade network, a local political sponsor, an absence of local competition and access to endless reams of paper. The initiative to publish a newspaper, however, lay not with Jansz—but with the magistrates of Arnhem. For several years the magistrates of Arnhem had received regular manuscript newsletters from Hendrik van Bilderbeek, a news writer in Cologne.<sup>8</sup> In the spring of 1619 the magistrates of Arnhem notified Van Bilderbeek that his services were no longer required—their subscription was to be cancelled. Instead, the magistrates turned to their local printer Jansz, and asked him to supply weekly printed newspapers for an annual sum of 20 gulden.<sup>9</sup> This was the birth of the Arnhem press.

The Arnhem newspaper was clearly modelled on the Amsterdam weeklies published by Caspar van Hilten and Broer Jansz since at least 1618. It is probable that the Arnhem magistrates received the Amsterdam newspapers, and decided that the future lay with this form of mechanised news production. It is certain that Jansz was inspired by Broer Jansz's untitled newspaper, to which the earliest surviving issue of the Arnhem newspaper bears much resemblance. This issue dates from 17 May 1621, and has no formal title; only the heading "From Heilbronn, 15 May".

1 The Duchy of Gelre contained a fourth quarter, the "Overkwartier" (Upper Quarter), but this was part of the Spanish Netherlands, and received no representation in the Dutch province of Gelre.

It appeared in the half-sheet folio style of the Amsterdam newspapers, with a double-column lay-out. Jan Jansz did not include his own name on the newspaper; the issue only stated that it was “printed in the year of our Lord”.

The next surviving issue of this Arnhem newspaper dates from 27 March 1623. In contrast to the Amsterdam newspapers, this issue was numbered (No. 13). The newspaper remained without a title. Instead it was headed by the issue number, followed by the year of publication in large roman numerals. It was this formula which Jansz maintained for the rest of his career. While the newspaper was untitled, it seems to have been known simply as the Arnhemsche Courante. This can be construed from the survival of a special issue of the Arnhem newspaper (dated from 5 February 1630), entitled the Ampliatie vande Arnhemsche courante (Supplement to the Arnhem newspaper).

Fourteen issues of the Arnhem newspaper, dated from 1621 to 1636, can be found today, spread between collections in Stockholm, Amsterdam and Leiden. The newspaper appeared on a weekly basis, initially on Mondays, but from 1623 usually on Tuesdays; if it was published regularly during this time, the survival rate is little more than 1.5%.<sup>10</sup> The few surviving issues indicate that the Arnhem newspaper featured almost exclusively news from the Holy Roman Empire. Jan Jansz had various business contacts in Cologne, further up the river Rhine, who may have supplied him with news reports from across the Empire.<sup>11</sup> Most surviving issues of the Arnhem newspaper include reports from major German centres: Vienna, Prague, Cologne, Frankfurt, Mainz and Leipzig, amongst others. The location of Arnhem, close to frequent engagements between the armies of the States General and Habsburg forces, also left Jansz well-positioned to include the latest domestic military news.

Compared to the Amsterdam newspapers of the 1620s the news presented in the Arnhem newspaper was relatively old.<sup>12</sup> Reports from Vienna, Regensburg and Prague were at times a month old—whereas the Amsterdam newspapers generally published similar reports one or two weeks earlier. The Amsterdam courantiers, operating at the heart of one of the most sophisticated information centres of the world, enjoyed the necessary infrastructure to publish the timeliest reports. Jan Jansz, and his readers, had to wait a little longer. The Arnhem schoolmaster David Beck, a good friend of Jan Jansz, seems not to have minded:

in his diary Beck regularly describes his trips to Jan Jansz's print shop, where he read his newspaper with great interest.<sup>13</sup> To local readers like Beck, far removed from the hub-bub of Amsterdam, older news was good enough. In this the magistrates of Arnhem, with their support for a local periodical venture, seem to have agreed.

Jan Jansz died in 1629. He was succeeded by his son-in-law, Jacob van Biesen (?–1677).<sup>14</sup> He had worked in Jansz's shop as an apprentice, and had married Jansz's daughter shortly before his father-in-law's death. Van Biesen enjoyed a long and prosperous career. Like his mentor and father-in-law, Van Biesen printed for the magistrates of Arnhem and the States of Gelderland, and was responsible for over one hundred works throughout his career.<sup>15</sup> Van Biesen also continued publication of Jansz's newspaper: issue 38 of 1632 carries his name and address in the imprint. Later Van Biesen reverted to the previous imprint formula: “printed in the year of our Lord”.

In the 1630s Jacob van Biesen began to include advertising in his newspaper. Two extant issues of the Arnhem newspaper contain an advertisement: on 27 May 1636 Van Biesen advertised for one of his own publications, the Giff-jagher, a tract containing remedies against the plague.<sup>16</sup> The advertisement specified that the book was also available in Amsterdam from the shops of Johannes Janssonius and Jan van Hilten, the courantier. Another book advertisement, dated 21 October 1636, was placed by the Dordrecht publisher Hendrick van Esch.<sup>17</sup> These advertisements indicate that Jacob van Biesen was not content to limit the sale and distribution of his newspaper to Arnhem only. The lack of more surviving issues of the Arnhem newspaper prevents a thorough analysis of Van Biesen's integration within a national distribution network. We do know, however, that Jacob van Biesen frequently advertised in Jan van Hilten's Courante uyt Italien. From these advertisements we also learn that many of Van Biesen's books, like the 1636 Giff-jagher, were available with Jan van Hilten in Amsterdam.<sup>18</sup> A 1654 advertisement placed by Van Biesen in the Courante uyt Italien specified that his Veerthien Boecken van de Geldersche geschiedenissen were also available with the widow of François Lieshout, another Amsterdam courantier.<sup>19</sup> Clearly Van Biesen maintained reasonable business relations with some of the Amsterdam newspaper publishers; perhaps they also took to sharing news reports and correspondents.

Jacob van Biesen was active as a publisher until his death in 1677. The last surviving issue of the Arnhem newspaper dates from more than forty years before his passing. How long did Van Biesen continue to publish the Arnhem newspaper? While there is no conclusive evidence of the continuation of the newspaper, it seems unlikely that Van Biesen stopped the venture in the 1630s or 1640s, when he was in the prime of his publishing career. Perhaps with the proliferation of newspapers in The Hague, Haarlem, Utrecht and Rotterdam in the 1650s and 1660s Van Biesen found himself producing a less profitable venture; perhaps there was a change in the Arnhem magistracy which eroded official backing for Van Biesen's enterprise. The French invasion of 1672 certainly disrupted the national infrastructure on which the newspaper market and book trade was based. With Arnhem occupied, an ageing and exhausted Van Biesen may have chosen this moment to call the extraordinary venture to a halt.

NB.

The first issue of 1632 was published on 30 December 1631.

Nieuwe Tijdinghen

Antwerp, 1620–1629

Abraham Verhoeven's Nieuwe Tijdinghen is one of the most fascinating news ventures of the seventeenth century.<sup>1</sup> The first newspaperman of the Habsburg Netherlands, Verhoeven (1575–1652) offered to his readers a unique product, unrivalled in style, presentation and content. In an age when the fundamental characteristics of serial news had not yet been established, Verhoeven experimented with alternative forms and methods of publication. Although he essentially tapped into the same news networks as other courantiërs and news writers throughout Europe, Verhoeven packaged this news with wit and flair. His issues were accompanied by bold headlines, woodcut illustrations, poems, satirical analysis, political musings and jokes. In essence, Verhoeven pioneered a news serial which combined the traditions of topical news pamphlets and commentary with the seriality of a newspaper.

Unlike most other newspapers of the seventeenth century, Verhoeven's issues were not strictly uniform. They did not always appear on the same date each week; they were generally published as a folded pamphlet in quarto or octavo of eight pages, but sometimes of twelve, sixteen, or even twenty-four pages; every issue had a different title, following more in the established tradition of the news pamphlet than what would become the norm for newspapers. Verhoeven's news serial has often been excluded from consideration as a true "newspaper" because of these irregularities. Nevertheless, Verhoeven's readers knew that these issues, notwithstanding the lack of a uniform title or a fixed publication date, belonged together.

Verhoeven's Nieuwe Tijdinghen, as the serial has come to be known, was published from the start of 1620 until April 1629.<sup>2</sup> Throughout this period Verhoeven published 1,346 different issues. This is remarkable for two reasons. Most courantiërs of the first decades of newspaper publishing printed one issue each week. Only by the second half of the seventeenth century would bi-weeklies, tri-weeklies and later dailies become the norm of newspaper publishing. Yet already by the early 1620s Verhoeven produced two, three or four issues each week. In 1621, his most productive year, Verhoeven printed 196 issues. In his least productive year, 1624, Verhoeven still printed 115 issues; most years he published around 140. Equally striking is the fact that only 42 of the 1,346 issues have been lost. With an astonishing survival rate of 97%, the Nieuwe Tijdinghen is one of the best surviving news serials of the seventeenth century. Over 600 issues can be found in Brussels alone, with other major collections in Antwerp, London, Paris, The Hague, Ghent, Amsterdam and Leiden. Stray issues and smaller collections are found in Tübingen, Louvain, Kew, Rotterdam, Haarlem, Middelburg, Tilburg, Dublin, Princeton, Harvard, Syracuse (NY) and St Petersburg. The Nieuwe Tijdinghen have survived so well because from the inception of his news serial Verhoeven encouraged his readers to bind together sequential issues. Indeed, the large collections of extant Nieuwe Tijdinghen are predominantly original seventeenth-century bound volumes; the volumes now present in Brussels were in the possession of the Jesuit College in Antwerp by 1639.<sup>3</sup>

Abraham Verhoeven started his career as an engraver, printer and bookseller in early seventeenth-century Antwerp. His father was an illustrator in the workshop of Christophe Plantin, but died when Abraham was young.<sup>4</sup> Little is known about Verhoeven's youth. In 1605 Verhoeven, by this point thirty years old, had established himself on the Lombardenvest, in the "Gulde Sonne" (Golden Sun), after an unspecified time as an apprentice. An ambitious man, eager to set himself up in the Antwerp book trade, Verhoeven petitioned the Privy Council in Brussels for a privilege to "print and cut in wood or engrave, and to sell, in all the lands of the Archdukes [the Habsburg Netherlands], the new tidings, victories, sieges, and conquests of towns" of the Archdukes.<sup>5</sup>

In effect, Verhoeven asked for a monopoly of printed military and foreign news. It was common for printers to demand monopolies for the publication of a book, but rarely did they demand or receive privileges for entire genres of print. Nevertheless, Verhoeven was granted this monopoly—not least because he presented himself as a model supporter of the Habsburg state. In this, as in other things, Verhoeven was a pioneer. He offered to provide systematic coverage of the achievements of the Habsburg sovereigns. But Verhoeven was not employed by the Habsburg Archdukes or their councillors, and his publications should not be interpreted as pure propaganda. Verhoeven was a shrewd businessman, and he knew that reports of victories and celebrations could sell very well, much better in any case than public acknowledgements of defeat. He offered publicity for the international Habsburg cause, but he also cultivated a profitable corner of the book trade. For the rest of his career, Verhoeven would rely for the majority of his business on the market for news.

Verhoeven stayed true to the wording of his privilege. Already in 1605 he had engraved and published thirteen illustrated broadsheets in Dutch, French and German, for the most part celebrating the successes of Marquis Ambrogio Spinola against the Dutch. Many other illustrated broadsheets were to appear in the following years. Verhoeven also printed almanacs, playing cards and maps. He made a specialism of the trade in ephemeral print, and he was recognised for it. In 1617 Verhoeven won a contract to print 200,000 copies of the list of lottery prize tickets for the Montes Pietatis, a Catholic corporate pawnbroker issuing loans with low or moderate interest rates.<sup>6</sup> While this sounds like simple work, it took a skilled artisan to publish high-quality ephemera. Verhoeven was charged with publishing five separate editions, in Italian, Spanish, French, German and Dutch. Almanacs often required expertise in printing with black and red ink; his work in the news world called for knowledge of several languages; and woodcuts and engravings called for a steady hand and artistic imagination. While large firms, such as the nearby Plantin-Moretus publishing house, could distribute the work load amongst many skilled artisans specialised in a particular task, Verhoeven ran his workshop with the help only of his family and one or two apprentices.

During the later 1610s Verhoeven invested more time and efforts in the publication of short news pamphlets, shifting his efforts from his illustrated broadsheets. In his 1617 pamphlet Verhael van t'principaelste datter nu onlanckx gheschiedt is, so wel hier te Lande als Italien, Vranck=rijck en Duytslant, Verhoeven told his readers that he intended to issue similar news pamphlets every eight or nine days.<sup>7</sup> This was more or less accurate: fifty-seven different news pamphlets published by Verhoeven in 1619 have survived, indicating that he was printing a little more than one pamphlet each week.<sup>8</sup> Verhoeven's news pamphlets published between 1617 and 1619 are nearly identical to the first issues of his news serial published from the start of 1620. The majority were published as folded pamphlets of four, eight or sixteen pages in quarto format. They contained large, bold titles, sometimes including a date of printing. The centre of the title-page was taken up by a large woodcut illustration or several woodcuts alongside one another, portraying some aspect of the content of the pamphlet. Invariably in these years, Verhoeven documented chiefly the early successes of the Austrian Habsburgs against their Protestant enemies at the start of the Thirty Years' War; the political and confessional divisions of the Dutch Republic; and particular sensational foreign events or disasters. At the bottom of the title-page the imprint read: "At Antwerp, by Abraham Verhoeven, on the Lombardenvest, in the 'Gulde Sonne'".

On 28 January 1620 Verhoeven's 1605 monopoly was renewed and extended by the Council of Brabant. It now included the exclusive right to print accounts of all victories of the Emperor "in Germany, Bohemia, Moravia, Austria, Silesia, Hungary and other Imperial provinces, exploited by [Generals] Bucquoy and Dampier, or others, as well as all new tidings from Holland, Brabant, and other provinces above the Meuse".<sup>9</sup> On 6 March this was confirmed by the Privy Council, securing his monopoly over the entirety of the Habsburg Netherlands.

The start of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen as a serial can be dated from around the extension of Verhoeven's monopoly. At the start of January 1620 Verhoeven published several news pamphlets on the latest progress of the Thirty Years' War, none of them any different from pamphlets published three years earlier. These publications, as many before them, appeared as eight-page quarto pamphlets (a full sheet of paper), mostly signed with the signature "A". But sometime in late February 1620 Verhoeven published a news pamphlet signed "B"; followed on 27 February by another signed "C".<sup>10</sup> On 13 March pamphlets signed “D” and “E” appeared. Verhoeven was, for the first time, highlighting that his printed news pamphlets were not individual publications, but distinct parts of a series to be bought and conserved as a continuous news serial. While any customer could walk into Verhoeven’s shop and buy a news pamphlet, Verhoeven was now encouraging readers to subscribe to his news service, providing the consecutive signatures as a guide for the customer or book-binder to gather the issues together at the end of the year.

Verhoeven further highlighted the seriality of his venture through short announcements at the end of his issues. He would notify his readers of the content of forthcoming issues or supplementary publications; the first issue of 1620 stated that the next issue of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen would discuss “the defeat of the Transylvanians in Hungary by the Imperial army”.<sup>11</sup> On fourteen occasions between January and May 1620 Verhoeven announced to his readers a following issue or accompanying maps or pamphlets. He would continue to do so throughout the 1620s, but most notifications advertising subsequent issues were placed in the first two years of publication, indicating that Verhoeven did his best to introduce potential customers to the notion of “serial news”. But these prompts were also significant for another reason, for with these short announcements Verhoeven had, in effect, invented newspaper advertising. Although this was a concept to be embraced and perfected by Verhoeven’s Dutch rivals in Amsterdam, the first newspaper advertisements can be traced to Verhoeven’s self-publicity in the early months of 1620.<sup>12</sup>

Verhoeven made another distinctive change at the start of 1621 when each issue featured, at the top of the title-page, a sequential number. Another development in the design of the series took place in October 1620, when the title-page began to be framed in a distinctive woodcut border, separating and highlighting the number, title, date of publication, illustration and imprint. From this point the Nieuwe Tijdinghen had achieved the characteristic and remarkably uniform appearance which it would maintain for the remainder of the 1620s. Even if each issue carried a different title, it would be impossible to look past the seriality of Verhoeven’s venture.

Most issues of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen were composed of eight pages. Between 1620 and 1622 the issues were printed in quarto, using a full sheet of paper, but from 1623 Verhoeven opted for a smaller octavo format, still publishing eight pages, but using only a half-sheet of paper. The first page was always taken up by the title-page headlines and illustrations. The second page or eighth page were often left blank; during the first two years of publication Verhoeven regularly used one of these pages for the text of his licence from the Privy Council as a warning to potential competitors.<sup>13</sup> Spare pages could also be taken up by additional woodcut illustrations of battles, towns or Habsburg generals. The actual news content of most Nieuwe Tijdinghen usually amounted to 800–1,200 words. Longer issues of sixteen or twenty-four pages contained closer to 2,500 or 3,000 words.

The actual quantity of news offered by the Nieuwe Tijdinghen, with its illustrations and bold headlines, was therefore much less than rival newspapers in Amsterdam, which were filled with text to the very edges of the page. But the Nieuwe Tijdinghen appeared more frequent than the weekly Amsterdam papers. On average Verhoeven published three issues each week from 1620 until 1628. The publication of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen was not tied to particular dates. Verhoeven generally published issues every Friday (the main market-day in Antwerp), but also frequently on Wednesdays and Saturdays, and sometimes on Tuesdays or Thursdays. Verhoeven often published two or three issues on the same day. Verhoeven also had a habit of reprinting particularly popular issues a few days after the original printing. The survival of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen in overlapping collections has revealed 114 variant editions. Around half of these variants contain typographical differences: correction of spelling mistakes, different signature statements, and differences in the title. Uniquely amongst seventeenth-century newspapers, fifty-two variants are distinct only because they contain a different date on the title-page. If Verhoeven anticipated heightened demand, it seems that he would sometimes keep the text in standing type, and reprinted a new run of copies the following day. At other times he would recompose the type of a popular issue three, four, or even seven days later and republish the same exact text.

Verhoeven was clearly not averse to printing what would generally be considered as old news in the newspaper trade, as long as it conformed to the overall Habsburg and Catholic worldview. Issue 51 of April 1621 contained an account of various Calvinist atrocities around Bacharach, events that had occurred in September of the previous year.<sup>14</sup> Issue 86 of June 1621 featured the text of an oath made by Gabriel Bethlen, the Transylvanian nemesis of the Austrian Habsburgs, allying himself with the Ottomans—an oath which he had taken in August 1620.<sup>15</sup> Verhoeven was well aware that many of his readers would not purchase a copy of his Nieuwe Tijdinghen for the latest reports, but for general curiosity or entertainment. Protestant atrocities and Habsburg victories could resonate throughout the year, and did not have to be reported only around the time of their occurrence.

The title-page presentation of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen was one of the most significant ways in which it distinguished itself from the mass of news serials. Verhoeven often used the titles and accompanying woodcuts to great effect, coupling bold headlines of victory, defeat, disaster and wonder with illustrations of battles, sieges, shipwrecks and executions. However, there was often a disjunction between the news content of an issue and the title-page rhetoric. Issue 111 of July 1622 was entitled simply “Der Calvinisten Onderganck” (The Calvinist Downfall).<sup>16</sup> Here Verhoeven presented a couple of general news reports which highlighted the declining fortunes of the Dutch and the Calvinist cause in Germany, together with reports from Constantinople, Paris and Spain on other subjects. Other headlines were more misleading. Issue 96 of September 1624 opened its title with the large header: “News from the King’s army before Breda”.<sup>17</sup> Only two short paragraphs on the final page of the issue were dedicated to the King’s army around Breda. The title of issue 90 of September 1625 was completely given over to a report from Liège: “News from the land of Liège; how those of Liège have executed several Dutch gueux who had plundered and ravaged throughout that land.”<sup>18</sup> Only one and a half pages of the same issue covered the report from Liège. Verhoeven frequently re-used his woodcuts, and did not cut a new illustration for every issue. Depictions of Marquis Spinola, a generic Turkish Sultan, and a chaotic cavalry battle appeared time and time again. To the knowledgeable reader, the title-page illustrations could also feel a little misplaced: issue 40 of 1622 contained reports from Den Bosch and The Hague, but featured on the title-page a woodcut of the coat of arms of Amsterdam.<sup>19</sup>

The Nieuwe Tijdinghen is also remarkable for the great stylistic variety that Verhoeven allowed himself in compiling his serial. Some issues offer general compilations of news, while others were devoted to a single issue, a single report, or poetic celebrations of the latest Catholic triumph. The first and most common form deviated little in content from other newspapers published throughout Europe: this was an issue with a variety of datelined news reports gathered from various European news centres. Around three-quarters of Nieuwe Tijdinghen issues are of this type. Most contain two to six news reports. Verhoeven’s main news network was composed of correspondence from Vienna, Prague, Venice, Rome, Cologne, Regensburg, Kraków, Paris, The Hague, Amsterdam, Dunkirk, Madrid, Seville and various Habsburg armies. Verhoeven would often dateline his reports using general geographic distinctions, such as “France”, “Germany” or “England” instead of offering distinctive place names.

Verhoeven complemented these general compilations with issues dedicated to specific momentous events. Great Habsburg victories, such as those at the battle of White Mountain (1620) and the siege of Breda (1624–1625), received endless coverage in the Nieuwe Tijdinghen. Verhoeven would publish several issues dedicated wholly to reports and lists of casualties. Deaths of Habsburg grandees, sieges, battles, executions, proclamations and fantastical or horrific events were likely to receive one or two issues’ worth of detailed exposure. Such issues were also more likely to be longer: issue 9 of 1622 was dedicated to a sixteen-page account of the death of three Catholic martyrs in Hungary.

A third variety of Nieuwe Tijdinghen issues were more polemical in tone. In the early 1620s Verhoeven published various issues focused exclusively on the defeats of the Elector Palatine and elected King of Bohemia, Frederick V, filled not with serious news reports but poems, songs and aphorisms. Other issues presented discussions on the twisted politics and confessional tyranny of the Dutch Republic, followed by songs in verse and with printed music notation.<sup>20</sup> Verhoeven added a comical touch to many Habsburg victories with hilarious depictions of the greatest foes of the Habsburg cause, including Frederick V, Count Ernst of Mansfeld and Gabriel Bethlen. Verhoeven reserved the greatest scorn for the Bishop of Halberstadt, Duke Christian of Braunschweig-Lüneburg, whom he always referred to as “the Mad Bishop”. When Duke Christian died in 1626 Verhoeven quipped that the nickname “the Mad Bishop” was really “a misnomer, for mad he was certainly, but bishop most definitely not”.<sup>21</sup>

Issues of this sort devoted exclusively to satire or entertainment were rare. More often than not, Verhoeven combined genuine news reports with satirical poetry or editorialised prefaces. This was the true strength of Verhoeven’s style. In his issue from 16 December 1620 Verhoeven presented two reports from Vienna and reports from Mainz and Amsterdam. At the end, Verhoeven claimed that many pasquilles had recently been disseminated around Amsterdam, bemoaning the poor state of affairs in the Dutch Republic. He then offered his readers the text of one of these seditious verses, satirising Dutch support of Frederick V:

It goes so badly for the Count Palatine
That he relies on Bethlen Gabor [Gabriel Bethlen]
And Bethlen Gabor is a real poor fellow
Who requires protection from the Turk
The Turk as enemy of Christian rule
Turns to the false Mohammed
And Mohammed is so far from God
That he turns to hellish Lucifer.
Consider now
Whom the Count Palatine thinks of as friends.<sup>22</sup>

Verhoeven was also adept at using title-page headlines to arouse the curiosity of his customers, or provide a quick laugh before they had browsed through the pages. Issue 21 of February 1622 was entitled “New tiding from the city of Jülich, and how the States [Dutch] garrison has [surrendered and] retreated with twenty-four companies of infantry”, to which Verhoeven added in a subtitle: “And how they have eaten cats and dogs [during the siege]”.<sup>23</sup> A report from the Imperial headquarters dated 12 August 1627 was datelined by Verhoeven as “From the Imperial (hitherto the Danish) headquarters at Boitzenburg”.<sup>24</sup>

Verhoeven had made his career in the news trade thanks to the successes of the Habsburg cause. His style and wit relied upon a steady stream of Habsburg heroes and a selection of hapless foes. The Nieuwe Tijdinghen were at their best when they contained a healthy mixture of European news reports and a few subtle jokes, illustrations and poems. The series had started at a time of great Habsburg success, but as the setbacks mounted in the later 1620s, Verhoeven was faced with a new challenge.

After the Habsburg siege of Breda in 1624–1625—which Verhoeven covered in minute detail across dozens of issues—the Nieuwe Tijdinghen lost some of its zest. Verhoeven continued to document closely Habsburg achievements throughout the world, for these had by no means come to a halt. The Nieuwe Tijdinghen from 1625 onwards highlighted poor economic conditions in the Dutch Republic, religious divisions between Remonstrants and Contra-Remonstrants, and Dutch losses against Dunkirk privateers. Spanish successes in Italy against France and Savoy and Imperial victories against Denmark received plentiful attention. But the tide was turning, and in the later 1620s the Dutch would make significant territorial gains in the Southern Netherlands, King Charles I of England declared war on Spain in 1625, and there were fewer victories for the Imperial cause in the Thirty Years’ War. Habsburg influence and power were generally diminished throughout Europe and the Americas.

This was reflected in Verhoeven’s Nieuwe Tijdinghen. In 1624 Verhoeven published not a single satirical issue, and such issues became rare in the final years of publication. On the whole the issues became more standardised, and resembled more and more other newspapers published throughout Europe. The celebratory headlines were 20 Take for example Iunius.] 1622. 77. *Hier wat wonder wat nieuws, van de Ghereformeerde brandt-stichterije van de geusen. Ghediscoureert, in een herberghe onder wegghen Mechelen ende Leuven. replaced by generic formulas. In 1626, 1627, 1628 and 1629 the Nieuwe Tijdinghen invariably started as “New tidings from”, “Strange tidings from”, or “Fresh news from various quarters”. The amount of news on offer also declined, and Verhoeven often filled out the Nieuwe Tijdinghen with woodcut illustrations of Habsburg generals or towns on the final pages of the issues. Furthermore, the woodcut illustrations used for the title-pages of the series were gradually wearing out, and Verhoeven cut few new illustrations. While Verhoeven’s productivity as courantier did not decline greatly (he still published more than 140 issues in 1627 and 1628), there were fewer advertisements for supplementary pamphlets, maps or illustrated broadsheets in these later years.<sup>25</sup>

Instead, Verhoeven devoted increasing space to refuting Dutch news writers. Verhoeven was well aware of the weekly newspapers that the Van Hiltens and Broer Jansz published in Amsterdam, and he seems to have followed their reports with great curiosity. When the balance of power tipped ever more in the favour of the Dutch in the later 1620s Verhoeven found himself rushing to respond to the news reports disseminated from Amsterdam. The second issue of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen of 1626 was largely taken up by a word-for-word refutation of Jan van Hilten’s Courante uyt Italien published on 6 December 1625.<sup>26</sup> Verhoeven countered Van Hilten’s reports of Spanish defeats in Savoy, the Hungarian constitution, Spanish demands for peace, English blockades of the Spanish coast, the progress of Habsburg general Tilly, and the possibility of peace in Denmark. At the end Verhoeven stated that “from this Dutch newspaper, and all others, one can clearly discern how the Dutch abuse their customers with lies”. In two issues from 1628 Verhoeven printed “Dutch lies from Amsterdam, arrived via Cologne”, and “two fat Dutch lies”, in order to undeceive his own customers.<sup>27</sup> The fact that Verhoeven devoted such attention to Dutch reports paints a picture of an ever more uncomfortable man and a distressed business.

While Verhoeven had moved in 1625 to the larger premises of his late parents-in-law on the Lombardenvest, the “Gulde Handt” (Golden Hand), his business was on the decline. Verhoeven suffered from gout, and he had large debts to colleagues in the book trade. By the start of 1629 Verhoeven’s tone had changed remarkably. In issue 3 of 13 January Verhoeven expressed to the reader a wish for a long peace and for an end to the destruction and suffering brought about by the war against the Dutch.<sup>28</sup> There were no boisterous titles or jokes to be found in the following issues.

The end of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen was swift. On 7 February Verhoeven received a reprimand from the Council of Brabant, ordering him to cease printing his Nieuwe Tijdinghen without proper visitation by the appointed ecclesiastical authorities.<sup>29</sup> Given Verhoeven’s long observance of the requirement for such inspection of his copy throughout his career, this seems somewhat unfair—and possibly motivated by other grievances.<sup>30</sup> It is no surprise that around the same time, the court printer of the Habsburgs, the widow of Huybrecht (I) Anthoon, received from the Privy Council a privilege for the publication of printed news.<sup>31</sup> The evaporation of official support for Verhoeven’s venture must have shaken the courantier greatly.

Verhoeven published only four issues in February. No Nieuwe Tijdinghen appeared between 7 February and 2 March. Several more issues appeared in March, but Verhoeven published nothing for the first three weeks of April. The final known issue dates from 27 April 1629. In June of the same year, Verhoeven would start a new periodical venture, the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe.<sup>32</sup> His career was not yet at an end. For the next five years Verhoeven would struggle on, moving ever further from the original style he pioneered in the 1610s and early 1620s. Verhoeven was too inventive for his own good. He offered to the news trade a different product, a different perspective, but no news publishers were to imitate him throughout the seventeenth century. Verhoeven’s Antwerp successors looked instead to the format and tone pioneered by Verhoeven’s Amsterdam rivals. Only in the eighteenth century did periodicals, especially in London, rediscover the tone, wit and typographical sophistications of Verhoeven’s first news serial. It was only then, too, that Verhoeven’s pioneering use of illustration found its true echo. Our modern press harks back more to Verhoeven than any other pioneer of the early newspaper age.

NB.

I have included in the following bibliography the three news pamphlets published by Verhoeven in January 1620, before he started to sign his news pamphlets consecutively. Arblaster, in From Ghent to Aix, marks the issue of 19 February 1620 as the first issue of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen, given that the next issue to appear was signed "B4".<sup>33</sup>

In December 1620 Verhoeven published one of his issues in French (a translation of an issue from 5 December 1620). Otherwise all issues are in Dutch.

Courante uyt Italien, Duytsland ende Nederlandt Delft, 1620–1643

The success of a commercial venture can often be measured by its imitation. This is especially true of the emergence of the periodical press in the Dutch Republic. In the university library of Amsterdam one finds an early newspaper issue entitled Wt Weenen den 7. Augusti, 1620 (From Vienna, 7 August 1620). On first sight it seems that this is a newspaper published by Broer Jansz in Amsterdam.<sup>1</sup> Up to 1629, it was his trademark to use the dateline of the first report as the title of his newspaper. Like Broer Jansz's newspaper, this issue was printed on a half-sheet folio, in a black letter typeface and in double columns. However, the imprint suggests that the origins of this publication are not so straightforward. Here it states that it was printed "At Delft, by Jan Andriesz., bookseller on the market in 't Gulden A.B.C.' (The Golden A.B.C.)." This issue is the earliest extant newspaper published in Delft.

By 1620 two weekly newspapers were published in Amsterdam: Caspar van Hilten's Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c. and Broer Jansz's (as yet untitled) Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren. It was clear that these two entrepreneurs aimed to cater to a readership beyond Amsterdam, and that they reached customers throughout the Dutch Republic—as is demonstrated by the placement of advertisements in the Amsterdam weeklies from booksellers throughout the country.<sup>2</sup> In these early years the print run of the Amsterdam newspapers cannot have been very high; most scholars have suggested a weekly edition of 400 or 500 copies.<sup>3</sup> With these limited numbers, Caspar van Hilten and Broer Jansz could send only a small portion of this print run to any other cities.

This is where Jan Andriesz Cloeting (?–1634), a successful printer and publisher, enters the stage. Cloeting was the most prominent printer of Delft, one of the oldest cities of Holland and an important centre of print in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries.<sup>4</sup> Cloeting enjoyed a prosperous position as stadsdrukker of Delft. He was a prolific pamphleteer, but also competed in the trade for larger theological and historical tomes.

The emergence of the newspaper presented Cloeting with an additional business opportunity. The city of Delft was a day's travel from Amsterdam; Cloeting could receive copies of the Amsterdam newspapers within a day of publication, and re-issued his own version for local distribution within another day. As long as Delft customers were willing to wait two days for an improved selection of news from Amsterdam, this was a commercial strategy with potential.

How did Cloeting produce his reprints? Dahl suggested that Cloeting copied content from Broer Jansz's Tijdinghen, a conclusion based on a comparison of a surviving issue of the Delft newspaper dated from 10 May 1623.<sup>5</sup> Most reports in this edition are lifted from Broer Jansz's newspaper of 8 May 1623. On the whole, however, it seems that Cloeting's Delft newspaper was the product of a balanced selection of news reports from both Amsterdam weeklies. The earliest surviving issue from 1620, not documented by Dahl, can be compared to Caspar van Hilten's Courante uyt Italien from Friday 21 August 1620. This demonstrates that Cloeting copied parts of the reports from Vienna, Linz and Prague directly from the Amsterdam Courante; it is likely that other reports, such as those from Leipzig, Switzerland and Cologne, were derived from the last issue of Broer Jansz's Tijdinghen from the same date, or perhaps from other sources.

The next surviving example of the Delft newspaper dates from 10 May 1623. This issue, like all later issues, carries a date of publication, as well as a title: the Courante uyt Italien, Duytsland ende Nederland. Cloeting had switched from using Broer Jansz's title to an imitation of the Amsterdam Courante uyt Italien. This title change was permanent, but Cloeting was by no means averse to plundering either Amsterdam newspaper. His issue from 13 August 1624 is largely copied from the Tijdinghen from 10 August; the issue from 18 March 1630 takes after the Amsterdam Courante from 16 March; and the issue from 5 October 1643 is similarly copied from the Courante of 3 October.

Cloeting usually published on Mondays, two days after the publication of the Amsterdam weeklies. The editorial flexibility of the Delft Courante allowed Cloeting to select from both Amsterdam newspapers whichever reports he deemed most relevant and interesting; he could also supplement these with news items from his own network of pamphleteers and news writers. In other aspects of presentation the Delft Courante kept up with developments in Amsterdam. Serial numbering appeared on the Delft newspaper from 1630 onwards—the Amsterdam weeklies both introduced this in 1629. There is no evidence of objections made by the two Amsterdam newspapermen against the blatant imitation of their style and content by Cloeting's Courante. Later in the seventeenth century newspapermen in Haarlem, Rotterdam and The Hague would see their newspapers reprinted verbatim in other Dutch cities, much to the detriment of their trade.<sup>6</sup>

Cloeting had clearly found a formula that worked. The Delft Courante was sustained for at least twenty-four years: the last known issue dates from 5 October 1643. Unfortunately, the Delft Courante has suffered the worst attrition rate of any long-lived seventeenth-century Dutch newspaper. From a total of over 1,250 issues—a weekly production of twenty-four years—only six can be found today. Five issues are extant in Stockholm, while the earliest issue is in Amsterdam. A seventh issue is known from a reference in Sautijn Kluit's history of Delft newspapers (1872), but this cannot be located today.<sup>7</sup>

The poor survival rate of the Courante can be explained by the newspaper's limited geographical distribution. The Courante undoubtedly catered to local customers, supplying the city of Delft and its immediate surroundings, rather than further afield. Cloeting was content for it to be a local newspaper, rather than competing for the national trade in news (indeed, one finds no advertisements in any surviving issue of the Courante). Clearly newspaper readers in Delft proved reliable customers; the longevity of the venture certainly suggests so. Jan Andriesz Cloeting's good relations with the city council of Delft as stadsdrukker also ensured that he had a local sponsor and official customer for his newspaper.

The publication of the Delft Courante passed down the Cloeting family.<sup>8</sup> After the death of Jan Andriesz Cloeting in 1634 the newspaper was briefly published by his widow, Ariaentje Ariëns (?–1638). Cloeting's son, Andries Jansz Cloeting (?–1648), then took over his parents' premises on the market square, as well as the publication of the newspaper. Apart from the premises, Andries also inherited many of his parents' responsibilities, and followed in their footsteps as a news publisher. Amongst his surviving corpus of publications one finds predominantly short news pamphlets and political tracts.

All trace of the Delft Courante vanishes with the death of Andries Cloeting in 1648. Perhaps the venture was continued by the Cloeting family; if so, they would certainly have found a tougher market in the 1650s and 1660s with the proliferation of newspapers throughout the Dutch Republic. By 1666 the citizens of Delft could find newspapers in Haarlem, Utrecht, and crucially, The Hague and Rotterdam—two major towns only a couple of hours away by barge. By the 1690s, one finds Jacobus Cloeting (1651–1715), a great-nephew of Jan Andriesz Cloeting, selling such newspapers to the Delft magistrates.<sup>9</sup> Now, with a market more integrated than ever, the model of the local reprint was obsolete.

Nieuwe Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt ende Nederlant
Utrecht, 1623

The first generation of Dutch newspaper publishers were dedicated news specialists. Broer Jansz (1579–1652), Caspar (?–1623) and Jan van Hilten (c. 1602–1655), François Lieshout (c. 1596–1646), Joost Broersz (1608/1609–1647) and Mathijs van Meininga (fl. 1642–1646) earned their daily bread with the publication of weekly newspapers, topical news pamphlets, and illustrated broadsheets of battles, sieges, or sensational events. While printed news pamphlets were almost as old as the invention of the printing press itself, these Amsterdam newsmen were some of the first publishers to build the foundations of successful careers in the book trade on the market for printed news. Although some of them would diversify their business once they had made a success of their news prints, these men established new norms in the book trade. They demonstrated that current affairs could pay, and pay well. Thanks to their success, courantiërs later in the seventeenth century would come to see newspaper publishing both as a canny financial investment and a means of building their profile in the local community.

A lesser known news specialist of the pioneering generation was the Utrecht publisher Adriaen Leenaertsz (?–1624).<sup>1</sup> From the first decade of the seventeenth century Leenaertsz published various news pamphlets, none larger than a single sheet of paper in quarto (eight pages). Leenaertsz occupied himself solely with current affairs. There are twenty-seven extant publications in Leenaertsz's name: each of them a short news pamphlet of four or eight pages.<sup>2</sup> Most of these pamphlets have survived in only one or two copies. Like the Van Hilten and Lieshout, Leenaertsz did not own a printing press, but devoted his time to maintaining a network of correspondents, sorting through reports and identifying stories.

One of Leenaertsz's earliest extant works, dated from 1606, indicates that he was already well embedded in an international news network more than a decade before the first Dutch newspaper was published. The Generale nieuwe Tijdinghe gheschreven uyt veel verscheyden steden, an eight-page pamphlet, offered a variety of date-lined reports from Italy and the Holy Roman Empire.<sup>3</sup> The 1622 pamphlet Waerachtighe beschryvinghe van de groote victorie van zyn Koningklike Majesteyt van Bohemen, ende Palts Graef aenden Rhijn contained similarly datelined news reports.<sup>4</sup> This style of reporting was common to manuscript newsletters, and would be adopted by newspapers throughout Europe. It seems probable that Leenaertsz was responsible, alongside his many printed pamphlets, for a manuscript news service—like many other news publishers in the seventeenth century.

In addition to his international connections Leenaertsz was also well networked in the domestic print industry. Leenaertsz's pamphlets were printed for him in a variety of print shops in Amsterdam, Alkmaar, Delft, Rotterdam, Middelburg and Utrecht. The Dutch Republic was the most concentrated centre of book production in Europe. The small size of the country, the large number of towns and the sophisticated infrastructure of waterways and canals created a highly integrated commercial market. Many Dutch publishers used the services of printers in other towns, either on an ad hoc basis or as part of bilateral arrangements maintained over a longer period. The greatest publishers in the Dutch Republic, men like Hendrick Laurensz (1588–1649) and Johannes Janssonius (1588–1664), with hundreds of titles to their name, could afford to allocate their printing to dozens of printers in different corners of the country to get the best deals.<sup>5</sup> Laurensz and Janssonius were prolific publishers, entrepreneurs who dealt in virtually every sector of the book trade, and who were responsible for many large tomes and expensive projects. Leenaertsz was a far more peripheral figure; but, remarkably, even as modest a man as this could employ an extensive network of printers throughout Holland and beyond.

With his journalistic expertise and book trade connections Leenaertsz had the perfect credentials to try his hand at the newspaper trade. Only a single example of Leenaertsz's newspaper, the Nieuwe Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt ende Nederlandt, has survived. Dated from Thursday 5 January 1623, this issue was unlikely to have been the first. Leenaertsz's extensive career as a newsman and the poor survival of his news pamphlets suggest that many more issues of this newspaper have been lost. Leenaertsz clearly imitated the titles established by Caspar van Hilten in Amsterdam (the Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c.) and Jan Andriesz Cloeting in Delft (the Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt ende Nederlandt).<sup>6</sup> Van Hilten published his weekly Courante from at least the summer of 1618, while Cloeting published his Delft Courante from 1620 onwards. Given that Leenaertsz copied their titles so closely, he is unlikely to have started his newspaper much before 1620.

The printer of the Nieuwe Courante is unknown, but I consider it probable that the Utrecht printer Jan Amelisz (fl. 1605–1636) was responsible for the newspaper. Amelisz had worked together with Leenaertsz on previous occasions, and was a prominent news printer in his own right.<sup>7</sup> Leenaertsz published the Nieuwe Courante as a half-sheet quarto pamphlet (of four pages), in a style similar to his topical news pamphlets. This was, at the time, a new departure: in the early 1620s all other Dutch newspapers appeared as double-sided folios. The reports of the Nieuwe Courante were set in a single column on all four pages, rather than the double-column presentation favoured in Amsterdam, Delft and Arnhem.

The Nieuwe Courante from 5 January 1623 contained a sizeable variety of reports: from Rome, Prague, Berlin, Regensburg, Leipzig (twice), Heidelberg, Frankfurt, Brietlingen, Cologne, Arnhem and Amsterdam. His news sources seem to have been largely independent of the established Amsterdam newspapers, the market leaders of the day. It was relatively easy for the Delft Courante uyt Italien to copy reports from Amsterdam papers, appearing as it did on a Monday, two days after the Amsterdam papers. Since Leenaertsz published his newspaper on Thursdays, the Amsterdam news would by this time have been too stale (and too familiar) to be worth recycling. Leenaertsz's sources included Berlin, Regensburg, Leipzig and Heidelberg—places of correspondence which rarely (if ever) appeared in the Amsterdam newspapers in the early 1620s. It is possible that Leenaertsz copied news reports from the Arnhemsche Courant, which by 1623 appeared on Tuesdays, but so few issues of the Arnhem paper have survived that a comparison is impossible.<sup>8</sup>

On 22 May 1624 Leenaertsz was buried in Utrecht, leaving a widow and three children.<sup>9</sup> The career of one of the more enigmatic courantiërs of the Dutch Republic had come to a definitive end. The next chapter in the history of the Utrecht press would start thirty-five years later, in 1658, with the arrival of the controversial Gerard Lodewijk van der Macht.<sup>10</sup> Leenaertsz remains an obscure figure, and but for the chance discovery of a single issue we would never know that he published a newspaper. Nevertheless, his pioneering career and his prolific activity are testament to the vitality of the Dutch news market, and they offer additional hints of the widespread diffusion of the periodical press in the early seventeenth century.

Wekelijcke Tijdinghe Antwerp, 1629–1631

In 1629 the Antwerp courantier Abraham Verhoeven (1575–1652) lost his unique position as privileged newsman of the Habsburg Netherlands. On 7 February Verhoeven was reprimanded by the Court of Brabant and ordered to refrain from publishing “gazettes or news reports most incorrect and without any prior proper visitation”.<sup>1</sup> Around the same time, the widow of Huybrecht (I) Anthoon, the printer of the government in Brussels, received a licence to publish regular topical news pamphlets—effectively superseding Verhoeven’s original privilege to print and sell news.<sup>2</sup> The exact reason for Verhoeven’s fall from grace is difficult to pin down. Shifts in the Habsburg administration and courtly patronage may have played a role in the decline of Verhoeven’s fortunes, as some of his former sponsors were removed from power or passed away.<sup>3</sup> In any case, the rebuke will have come as a shock to the ageing Antwerp newshound. Verhoeven had dedicated the last nine years of his life to the publication of his Nieuwe Tijdinghen, producing two, three or four issues of the serial each week without rest.<sup>4</sup> Verhoeven was suffering from gout; his marriage was broken; and he was pursued incessantly by debtors in the Antwerp book trade. A scolding from his superiors could not have come at a worse time.

The final issue of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen appeared on 27 April 1629, after two months of intermittent and irregular publication. A lesser courantier might have given up at this point, but for Verhoeven the news trade was now his lifeblood. Verhoeven had few assets and had not been enriched by his efforts of the last three decades in the book world. While later courantiers in the Low Countries would be influential and respected members of their local community, often publishing a newspaper only as a financial investment and as a mark of social distinction, Verhoeven enjoyed no such comforts. He had to publish to survive.

On 27 June 1629 Verhoeven launched the first issue of his new venture: the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe. The new serial was a step back from the Nieuwe Tijdinghen. Gone were the boisterous titles, topical woodcut illustrations and political satire; Verhoeven’s new venture resembled more closely the sober, uniform style of newspapers in Germany and the Dutch Republic. The Wekelijcke Tijdinghe did not feature a title-page; only a large header detailed the year, title and issue number at the top of the first page. The date and imprint were found at the end of the final page. The newspaper appeared as a folded quarto pamphlet; the first issue was made up of a full sheet of eight pages, and included seventeen news reports from across Europe. Verhoeven had clearly built up sufficient news for an impressive opening issue for the launch, but next week the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe appeared in only four pages (a half-sheet). Verhoeven would maintain this smaller size for the next two years.

Verhoeven published 240 issues of the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe from June 1629 to June 1631: 53 issues in 1629, 122 issues (and one special issue) in 1630, and another 64 issues in the first half of 1631. Fortunately, 238 of the 240 issues have survived in a single run in the Koninklijke Bibliotheek in Brussels—only two issues from 1629 are missing. Without this extraordinary run (most unusual for a seventeenth-century newspaper), we would have no knowledge of Verhoeven’s new venture during these years.

The periodicity of the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe was, like the Nieuwe Tijdinghen, not fixed. Verhoeven usually published two issues each week, but sometimes three. Curiously, these two or three weekly issues generally appeared on the same day, rather than spread out through the week. The day of publication varied: Verhoeven often chose Wednesdays, Thursdays or Fridays, but occasionally Tuesdays and Saturdays. When Verhoeven published two or three issues on the same day, he often divided the content according to geographical boundaries. One issue would feature news from the Holy Roman Empire, or from Italy, while the other included news from the Low Countries or France. The regular subscriber would still receive full value from Verhoeven’s extensive news network, but the casual buyer could choose to buy news from specific theatres of war without paying the full price for two or three issues. For all his personal and financial troubles, Verhoeven was an agile and inventive businessman, always looking for a new way to develop the genre and pique the interest of his customers. But he was the only newsman in the whole century who attempted this sort of advanced compartmentalisation; if other publishers noticed this radical gambit, they chose not to follow suit.

4 See chapter 4.

Verhoeven received regular reports from Rome, Venice, Vienna, Prague, Leipzig, Cologne, Hamburg and Paris, and had plenty of access to sources throughout the Habsburg Netherlands detailing the struggle against the Dutch. This network had changed little during the 1620s, and resembled closely the network of correspondents which Verhoeven had used for the Nieuwe Tijdinghen. However, now that the focus of the Thirty Years' War shifted north towards the Baltic, Verhoeven also presented more frequently reports from Danzig, Rostock, Toruń and Königsberg.

On average, the issues of the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe contained five reports each, composed of some 600–1,000 words.<sup>5</sup> This was by no means a diminutive quantity—Verhoeven's Dutch rivals in Amsterdam, Jan van Hilten and Broer Jansz, offered around ten to twelve reports in their weekly issue.<sup>6</sup> With multiple issues each week, Verhoeven could easily match this production. The courantier was down on his luck, but he had not yet given up.

Nevertheless, Verhoeven's Wekelijcke Tijdinghe was launched at an unfortunate moment. The capture of the Spanish silver fleet in 1628 by the Dutch privateer Piet Hein prompted a financial slump in Antwerp in 1629, and the Spanish Habsburgs suffered successive defeats at the hands of the Dutch in the later 1620s and early 1630s. Much of the loot gained from the silver fleet was used to finance Frederick Henry's siege of Den Bosch during the summer of 1629. Den Bosch, one of the four chief cities of Brabant, was widely regarded as an impregnable fortress. Verhoeven followed the siege in his Wekelijcke Tijdinghe with delight, anticipating the destruction or retreat of the Dutch forces. Two days before the fall of the city Verhoeven devoted an entire issue to the siege—thereafter he mentioned nothing of it.<sup>7</sup> There were only a few issues of the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe published with the typical bold headlines of victory and celebration which Verhoeven had used so often for his Nieuwe Tijdinghen. The capture of Mantua by Spanish forces in the summer of 1630 prompted Verhoeven to issue three separate issues devoted to the event on 7 August—but this was an exception. Verhoeven was largely restricted to minor victories: he published on 14 March 1631 a list of Dutch ships taken by Barbary pirates, reported from Rotterdam.<sup>8</sup> The lack of victories, combined with an economic decline, cannot have helped Verhoeven's sales.

Around 1631 Verhoeven was hit by another setback. The Antwerp publisher Hieronymus (II) Verdussen had petitioned the Habsburg government in 1630 for a monopoly on the production and distribution of almanacs in the Habsburg Netherlands.<sup>9</sup> This Verdussen received, but after a general outcry among Antwerp booksellers Verdussen's monopoly was restricted to one year. Almanacs were some of the most popular products of the early modern book world—successful almanac printers could be assured of large sales and steady profits. Verhoeven had printed many almanacs throughout his long career, and continued to do so to boost his income alongside his newspaper. However, in 1631 Verdussen and the Court were watchful. When Verhoeven sought to distribute one of his almanacs throughout the Habsburg Netherlands orders were sent out to seize the offending copies. These orders, although they targeted all “unlicensed almanacs”, identified Verhoeven as a notable culprit.<sup>10</sup> This prosecution can only have aggravated Verhoeven's financial struggles.

The final surviving issue of the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe was issue 64, dated from 18 June 1631. It is possible that Verhoeven continued the series a little longer, throughout the second half of 1631; but the courantier was clearly frustrated and hesitant. At the start of 1632 he changed the structure of his newspaper once more, modelling his final venture on his Amsterdam rivals in format and style.<sup>11</sup> This was an anxious response of a tired and defeated man. Verhoeven's career was descending rapidly towards its ignominious end.

Extraordinaris Courante Amsterdam, 1631

The final years of the 1620s saw a reversal of fortunes in the Eighty Years' War. Under the military leadership of Stadhouder Frederick Henry, Dutch armies gained successive victories against Habsburg forces at Grol, Wesel, Den Bosch, the Slaak, Venlo, Roermond and Maastricht.<sup>1</sup> The momentum of the Spanish advance of the early 1620s was at an end. At the same time, the tide was turning in the Thirty Years' War across the Holy Roman Empire.<sup>2</sup> The entry of Sweden in 1630 would lead to a series of Protestant successes, inspiring celebrations and improving morale throughout Protestant Europe.

The shifting fortunes of Europe's great conflicts were reflected by the contrasting fortunes of newspapermen in Amsterdam and Antwerp. Abraham Verhoeven's business entered a downward spiral from 1629 onwards, and the Antwerp newsman faded away by the end of 1634.<sup>3</sup> In the north, matters were wholly different. Although the rapid growth of the Amsterdam news market was still several years away, it was clear that change was on the horizon. In the first years of the 1630s, the two established Amsterdam weeklies diversified and expanded their sources of news. Undoubtedly spurred on by the rising success of the Dutch Republic, the publishers of the Courante uyt Italien and the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, Jan van Hilten (c. 1602–1655) and Broer Jansz (1579–1652), entered a prosperous period, leaving behind the more testing, uncertain time of their early years as courantiers in the 1610s and 1620s.<sup>4</sup>

Around 1631 the two established ventures were joined in the news market by a third Amsterdam proprietor. This was Cornelis Lodewijksz vander Plasse (1585–1641), a bookseller and publisher living at the bourse, in the "Italiaensche bybel" (Italian bible).<sup>5</sup> The Koninklijke Bibliotheek in The Hague contains the only surviving record of his new enterprise. Classmark KW 341 A 1, a volume composed of over 400 issues of the newspapers of Jan van Hilten and Broer Jansz (dated largely from 1626 to 1635), contains one issue of the Extraordinaris Courante, published by Vander Plasse.

Dated from 6 November 1631, its full title reads Extraordinaris Courante of seckere schryven uyt Ceulen, Den 30. October. 1631 (Extraordinary newspaper, or particular writings from Cologne, 30 October, 1631). This issue is unnumbered, and is printed on the recto of a half-sheet folio only. The news is presented in two columns, as was the case with the Amsterdam weeklies, but the black letter typeface used is much larger than that of the established newspapers of Van Hilten and Jansz. In total, the issue contains around 500 words, meagre in comparison to the double-sided Saturday weeklies featuring circa 1,800 words. The title and content of the publication suggest that this is a special issue; the question remains whether this is a one-off publication, an "extraordinary" without an overarching periodical venture.

The Extraordinaris Courante contains one report, from Cologne. It details the state of war in the Holy Roman Empire, describing the extraordinary success of Gustavus Adolphus following the battle of Breitenfeld, fought against a superior Habsburg force on 17 September 1631. The report, dated a month and a half after this momentous engagement, narrates how the Swedish king has conquered "all of Württemberg and Bamberg". He has also taken Würzburg, where he has found grain for his troops, and taken forty-two pieces of ordnance. The city paid the Swedes 400,000 florins, and they gathered up further sums of 200,000 and 150,000 florins in other unspecified places.

The report describes how the Habsburg forces had regrouped after Breitenfeld: generals Tilly, Aldringen and Fugger retained 25,000 infantry and 12,000 cavalry under their command, and they caused "great damage to villages and cities, which they burn to ashes and where they murder and burn." The Swedish army brought swift retribution: when the two armies met in the field, the Imperial army experienced a second crushing defeat. According to the report, the Imperial Habsburg forces lost 9,000 men in this new battle, including many officers, the commander Count Tserclaes of Tilly and the Duke of Lorraine; the Swedes also captured 132 cannon and more than 100 field artillery pieces, as well as 365 wagons and 600 horses.

This second battle never took place. While the Swedes did advance further into the German heartland, taking Frankfurt and Mainz before the end of the year, the Imperial troops retreated through Westphalia, regrouping without suffering another major defeat.<sup>6</sup> Tilly's death was frequently reported in 1631, and Dutch readers had already learned of his death at the battle of Breitenfeld at the end of September.<sup>7</sup> In fact, Tilly was not to die until 1632; but with the extraordinary success of the Swedish forces in 1631, rumours of Tilly's demise were all too plausible in these months.

While the news content and the political context of the Extraordinaris Courante may suggest that this was indeed a one-off publication designed to target the burgeoning news market, the publishing career of Vander Plasse would suggest the contrary. Cornelis Lodewijksz vander Plasse was a prolific publisher, active since 1611, established at the heart of Amsterdam's information centre, the bourse.<sup>8</sup> He was a specialist in literary publications, responsible for the publications of many plays by contemporary Dutch playwrights Samuel Coster and Gerbrand Bredero, as well as more traditional bestsellers, such as the works of Amadis of Gaul. Vander Plasse also published various works of music, and engaged himself in the almanac and Bible trade—both profitable markets. Vander Plasse enjoyed extensive connections in Amsterdam, and his works were printed by numerous printers: these included Broer Jansz, publisher of the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren, and Joris Veseler (c. 1589–1624), the printer of the Courante uyt Italien until 1624.<sup>9</sup>

It is these connections with the Amsterdam newspapers which is key to deciphering the publication of the Extraordinaris Courante. While Vander Plasse was not a true newsman himself, the heightened news demand in the Protestant Dutch Republic and endless rumours and reports emanating from the German front combined to create a tempting market for a flourishing publisher like Vander Plasse. It is likely that the Extraordinaris Courante was printed by Broer Jansz, in association with and financed by Vander Plasse. Such a partnership could rely on Broer Jansz's established distribution network, and allow Vander Plasse to make a decent profit in a part of the book trade in which he had not previously been much involved. I consider it probable that the Extraordinaris Courante was not the only issue published in this manner by Vander Plasse in 1631. It therefore deserves a place in this bibliography; both as a likely temporary news serial, and as evidence of the dynamism of the Protestant news sphere dominated by Amsterdam in the first half of the seventeenth century.

Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c.

By 1632 Abraham Verhoeven (1575–1652) was fifty-seven years old. The Antwerp courantier had enjoyed a long but exhausting career. Verhoeven was now at the end of his luck: in debt to many of his colleagues in the book trade, out of favour at court, and suffering from gout.<sup>1</sup> International affairs were also against him. After the triumphs of the Habsburgs in the opening stages of the Thirty Years' War and the impressive campaigns of Ambrogio Spinola against the Dutch in the early 1620s, the tables had turned. The capture of the Spanish silver fleet in 1628 by the Dutch privateer Piet Hein was followed by a series of Spanish defeats: at Wesel (1629), Den Bosch (1629) and the Slaak (1631). Although Verhoeven tried to maintain a cheery optimism in his news serial, the boastfulness of his Nieuwe Tijdinghen in the early 1620s—celebrating the triumphs of Habsburg generals throughout Europe—was no longer possible. Verhoeven was a tired and broken man.

The final known issue of Verhoeven's Wekelijcke Tijdinghe, published since 1629, dates from 18 June 1631.<sup>2</sup> This bi-weekly venture represented a cautious step back from the exuberant illustrated issues of the Nieuwe Tijdinghen (1620–1629) with their boisterous, triumphalist title-page woodcuts. But the style of the Wekelijcke Tijdinghe did not suit Verhoeven long; by 1632, and possibly already in the autumn of 1631, Verhoeven changed the title and format of his news serial once more.

The result was the Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c., a close imitation of his great Amsterdam rivals, Broer Jansz and Jan van Hilten. The Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c. appeared as an unfolded folio leaf, with news reports printed in double columns on both sides—the style pioneered by the Amsterdam newspapers in the later 1610s. Even the title of Verhoeven's new venture was clearly inspired by Van Hilten's Courante uyt Italien, Duytschlandt, &c. While the Nieuwe Tijdinghen had embodied Verhoeven's unique style of reporting and news presentation, Verhoeven's imitation of his northern counterparts symbolised defeat. Old, exhausted and undoubtedly frustrated, Verhoeven played safe, copying the format of his flourishing rivals whom he had so often mocked in the 1620s for their false reporting.

The features of the Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c. that set it apart from the Amsterdam weeklies only drive home the point that this was a weak imitation of the Dutch models. Verhoeven's reports were often jumbled, arranged in no clear geographical or chronological order. The Antwerp newspaper also contained far less news: the final issue of 6 September 1634 contained around 900 words, compared to around 2,000 words for the Amsterdam newspapers. Furthermore, the approval of the censor, in the form of their printed initials, was set prominently after the end of each issue. It was clear what northern readers thought of such association with Catholic authority: the earliest surviving issue of the Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c. contains a marginal note by a contemporary Protestant reader, stating: "Vide et ride mendacia Papistica" (Look and laugh at these Papist lies).<sup>3</sup>

Eleven issues of the Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c. have survived, dating between 10 March 1632 and 6 September 1634—all are found in the Kungliga Biblioteket in Stockholm. The patchy survival of the newspaper renders it difficult to provide a comprehensive reconstruction of Verhoeven's output in these final stages of his career. The Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c. was usually published on Wednesdays or Fridays (four surviving issues each), but also occasionally on Saturdays (two surviving issues) or Thursdays (one surviving issue). It seems that the Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c. appeared at least once a week on any of these days, but sometimes twice a week. At least sixty-three issues were published between January and November 1632; thirty-one issues between January and October 1633, and thirty-six issues between January and September 1634.

The surviving issues suggest Verhoeven continued to follow closely the military campaigns of the Thirty Years' War, now dominated by the Swedish intervention, and the conflict closer to home. The summer of 1632 would prove an eventful campaigning season. A noble revolt against the Habsburg government in the Southern Netherlands, led by the prominent Habsburg general Count Hendrik van den Bergh, was assisted by an invasion by the Prince of Orange, Frederick Henry. While the revolt failed to inspire a general uprising, Van den Bergh and the Prince of Orange were able to march deep into Habsburg territory, and capture the fortress-towns of Venlo, Roermond, Sittard and Maastricht. In his issue of 12 August 1632 Verhoeven opened with a report from the “King’s army at Maastricht”, hoping to relieve the siege—the city would fall ten days later. The successes of the Dutch renewed calls for a truce, and Verhoeven’s issue of 8 October 1632, printed on one side only, reported on the return of Habsburg negotiators from Maastricht.<sup>4</sup> This issue would also find its way to the Dutch Republic, where it was reprinted anonymously.<sup>5</sup>

By 1634 international developments looked rosier for Verhoeven. In the autumn Imperial forces defeated the Swedes at Nördlingen, and in early November the new Governor-General, the Cardinal-Infante Ferdinand, made his entry into Brussels. Despite these more hopeful developments on the war front, Verhoeven’s financial troubles had by now caught up with him. On 5 September 1633 Verhoeven began to rent out his shop to his son, Isaac Verhoeven (1607–1637).<sup>6</sup> Less than a year later, on 1 August 1634, Verhoeven sold his entire shop and its contents, including all rights to his news publications, to Isaac for 2,100 gulden.<sup>7</sup> Abraham did so on the condition that he would receive a weekly wage of 6 gulden—a standard wage for a skilled artisan in the book trade—as long as he was able to help out in the shop. Isaac would continue to publish the Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c., but he maintained his father’s name on the imprint, at least until September. The last known issue of the newspaper appeared on 6 September 1634; the final known publications printed by Isaac Verhoeven in his father’s name are two short news pamphlets detailing the arrival of the Cardinal-Infante in Brussels on 4 November 1634.<sup>8</sup>

It is uncertain how long Isaac Verhoeven continued to publish the Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c. Isaac died in February 1637, but already in the spring of 1635 other Antwerp book men would take their chance and establish competing newspapers.<sup>9</sup> It is thus possible that Isaac abandoned the venture soon after taking over his father’s premises.

Abraham Verhoeven had been reduced to a pitiful state, earning a daily wage as a fifty-nine year old assistant in his son’s print shop. But his tribulations had not yet come to an end. In the autumn of 1634 Verhoeven was sued for the sum of 1,345 gulden by the Antwerp bookseller Cesar-Joachim Trognésius.<sup>10</sup> Verhoeven was given a year to repay Trognésius, but could not meet his obligations. A property belonging to Verhoeven was seized in October 1635 and sold to finance his repayments to Trognésius. Verhoeven outlived his son, Isaac, and afterwards moved back to his former print shop, the “Gulde Sonne” (Golden Sun), where he had printed the first issues of his Nieuwe Tijdinghen in 1620. Abraham lived out the rest of his long life in poverty and ill health. His signature in 1644 betrays that of a man barely able to write—when he died in 1652, aged seventy-seven, he could only sign with an unsteady cross.<sup>11</sup> The prolific Antwerp pioneer had come to a painful and lonely end.

NB.

The first three surviving issues of the newspaper opened with the title Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c., but later issues also opened with Courante uyt Nederlandt, Courante wt Vranckrijck and Courante wt Polen ende Duytslandt.

I have chosen not to infer any lost issues of the Courante due to the paper’s patchy survival and irregular publication. The number of the earliest surviving issue is illegible due to damage to the copy.

Untitled Amsterdam Newspaper Amsterdam, 1632

The university library of Ghent holds the only copy of a Dutch newspaper published by the Amsterdam printer Jacob Thomasz Sergeant (1609–1636) in 1632. Sergeant, the son of a Schiedam schoolmaster, had a print shop around the corner from the Oude Kerk, a little removed from the centre of the Amsterdam book trade.<sup>1</sup> He was a minor figure in the trade, working primarily as a jobbing printer for publishers in Amsterdam and Rotterdam. The few titles which Sergeant published under his own name are all short, ephemeral works, none larger than half a dozen sheets.

The surviving issue of Sergeant's newspaper dates from Wednesday 8 September 1632. It is presented in the conventional format of Dutch newspapers, as an unfolded half-sheet folio, with reports set in two columns. Unlike other newspapers of this period, Sergeant's newspaper is printed on one side only. The newspaper is untitled, and features as a header only the statement "No. 37. MDCXXXII". The surviving issue contains six news reports. The first is datelined from "the army of His Princely Excellency around Maastricht, the 2nd ditto [sic, September], 1632", and concerns repairs to the city ordered by the Prince of Orange after its capture on 22 August. The other reports focus chiefly on the manoeuvres of the Habsburg General Pappenheim, who tried to relieve the siege a month earlier.

What can one make of this obscure, but somewhat unimpressive venture? It is unlikely that Sergeant maintained an independent newspaper in the early 1630s. Rather, the title and content of this surviving issue indicate that Sergeant was reprinting an issue of the contemporary Arnhemsche Courant.<sup>2</sup> This weekly Arnhem paper, published from 1629 by Jacob van Biesen (?–1677), used the same header as Sergeant's paper, with the issue number followed by the year in roman numerals. The Arnhem paper was published on Mondays, and could have reached Sergeant late on Monday or Tuesday, in time for him to select a few news reports and print an edition himself on Wednesday.

The pirating of newspapers was a common feature of the Dutch news market; newsmen in Haarlem, The Hague and Rotterdam later in the century would suffer at the hands of printers reproducing unauthorised copies of their issues in other Dutch cities.<sup>3</sup> In Arnhem, Jacob van Biesen was uniquely positioned to receive the latest reports from the front further up the rivers Rhine and Meuse. Given the media frenzy surrounding the conquest of Maastricht in 1632, it is likely that Sergeant decided to reissue one or more editions of Van Biesen's newspaper in Amsterdam. Perhaps he offered a regular reprint of the Arnhem paper. On Wednesday it would be several days before the two Amsterdam weeklies, published by Jan van Hilten and Broer Jansz, would be able to comment on the latest reports from the campaign. Sergeant, a young printer looking for a quick profit, shrewdly identified a gap in the market and took his chance.

Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe

Antwerp, 1635–1690

Antwerp was one of the great news centres of early modern Europe: it served as a vital hub in the European postal network, and was one of the first cities in Europe to support a local newspaper. During the seventeenth century Antwerp would decline somewhat in its importance to the postal system, certainly in comparison to Brussels, Amsterdam and Rotterdam. Nevertheless, it continued to play a significant role in the expansion of the European news industry. It is no surprise, then, that the decline and disappearance of Antwerp's first courantiër—Abraham Verhoeven—in the mid-1630s did not leave the city without a periodical press.<sup>1</sup> While Abraham's son and daughter-in-law would try to maintain the Verhoeven legacy, two new newspapermen entered the local business in 1635, turning Antwerp into one of the few European cities with a competitive local press.<sup>2</sup>

The first of this new generation of courantiërs was Willem Verdussen (1592–1667).<sup>3</sup> Willem was born into one of the most prominent Southern Netherlandish printing families.<sup>4</sup> Willem's father was Hieronymus (I) Verdussen (1533–1635), an important figure in the devotional and Spanish-language book trade in the Southern Netherlands, and printer of the King's ordinances of the mint. Willem entered the Antwerp book trade in 1613, joining the guild of St Luke.<sup>5</sup> He took over his father's shop "De X Geboden" (The Ten Commandments), located centrally on the Cathedral churchyard when his father and older brother Hieronymus (II) (1583–1653) moved to larger premises in "De Rode Leeuw" (The Red Lion).<sup>6</sup> For the next twenty years Willem published a few devotional and medicinal tracts, but his output was not substantial. Willem worked closely with his older brother, but also took on a distinguished position as one of the bell-ringers of the Antwerp cathedral.<sup>7</sup>

While Hieronymus (II) would follow in his father's footsteps, concentrating on religious, literary and classical genres in the book industry, Willem took a different path. Sometime in late 1634 Willem petitioned the Council of Brabant for a licence to publish a newspaper. The original application has not survived, but a note regarding the petition states that Willem was encouraged to apply by members of the merchant community, who had asked him to print and circulate regular news tidings.<sup>8</sup> It was no coincidence that Verdussen applied for a licence around this time—nor is it likely that he needed much encouragement from potential customers to start a newspaper. Abraham Verhoeven had effectively left the news trade when he sold the rights to his newspaper to his son Isaac in September 1634, and the future of that newspaper was uncertain. Verdussen identified a viable gap in the market: by 1634 the citizens of Antwerp had become used to a regular newspaper.

Willem Verdussen received a licence from the Council of Brabant valid for a period of ten years, and started his newspaper, the Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe, around March or April 1635. This was an auspicious year for the Habsburg cause in the Low Countries. In the spring of 1635 a Franco-Dutch coalition invaded the Habsburg Netherlands, joining forces to take the town of Thienen and lay siege to Louvain. Within two weeks, however, the siege was broken by the Habsburg General Ottavio Piccolomini, and the French and Dutch armies melted away. Verdussen was able to launch his paper with tidings of the complete rout of a superior enemy force, a fortuitous piece of timing that undoubtedly provided some positive publicity for his new venture.

The Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe appeared in the same style as most Dutch newspapers of the first half of the seventeenth century: an unfolded folio leaf, with two columns of reports on each side. Verdussen emphasised in his petition to the Council of Brabant that this style was a "new invention", and much to be preferred to the pamphlet format in vogue in Germany, France and England—and previously in Antwerp.<sup>9</sup> The Dutch format was in all likelihood also preferred by Verdussen because it was more economical in its use of paper than the folded pamphlet—the price of paper in the Habsburg Netherlands (most of which was imported from France) having soared after the French declaration of war at the start of 1635.<sup>10</sup>

Willem Verdussen's Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe was sustained over a long period: from 1635 until 1690. For this information we have to rely largely on archival records, since issues of the paper have suffered a rate of attrition severe even by the standards of the seventeenth-century newspaper world. Of the probable 4,000 issues published throughout these fifty-six years, only 104 can be found today. Most surviving issues date from the 1630s, 1640s and 1660s. For the last seventeen years of publication (1674–1690), not a single issue has survived.

The high attrition rate of the Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe has also obstructed a complete reconstruction of the newspaper's erratic publication schedule. Verdussen clearly intended to publish the newspaper as a bi-weekly, but for most of the 1630s he was unable to do so regularly. On average he published three issues every two weeks; and the paper moved around the week with issues appearing on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays. By the 1640s Verdussen was effectively publishing a bi-weekly, producing around one hundred issues each year, but the dates of publication continued to alternate. Most issues appeared on Tuesdays and Fridays, but subscribers could also still expect some to be published on Wednesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays. It is noteworthy that this erratic start was mirrored by Verdussen's local rival, Martin Binnart (c. 1590–1652/53), who started his Den Ordinariissen Postilioen around November 1635.<sup>11</sup> Binnart similarly intended his newspaper as a bi-weekly to appear on Tuesdays and Fridays, but also struggled to maintain a regular schedule. Both men probably found the disruptions of the Franco-Spanish War (1635–1659) to their paper supply and postal routes too taxing for strict periodicity.

Verdussen adopted a unique, but confusing numbering system for the Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe. Most seventeenth-century newspapers had serial numbering, with each year starting a new sequence.<sup>12</sup> Verdussen also numbered his newspaper, but instead of finishing each sequence at the end of the year, he began a new sequence once he had published one hundred issues. When he reached his first hundred numbered issues, sometime in the late summer or early autumn of 1636, he began a new series from 1 to 100; and so forth. However, Verdussen did not use this system meticulously: several series did finish at the end of the year, without reaching the hundredth issue.

Verdussen's news network was more promising than his inventive numbering. The Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe contained regular despatches from Rome, Venice, Vienna, Leipzig and Hamburg, but also frequent reports from Milan, Dunkirk, Lyon and Prague.<sup>13</sup> From the few surviving issues it seems that Verdussen offered a more diverse range of reports than his competitor Binnart, although both men focused firmly on events in the Holy Roman Empire: the bulk of news in both newspapers emanated from Saxony, Bohemia and the Rhineland.

From 1635 onwards Verdussen appears to have tailored his business to the news industry exclusively. All his extant publications from the mid-1630s onwards are short news pamphlets, never longer than three sheets in quarto, or twenty-four pages. It also seems that Verdussen started a French news serial, like his rival Binnart. In 1648 Verdussen published the bi-weekly Gazette Ordinaire, next year retitled as Nouvelles Ordinaires. Only a single issue from each year has survived.<sup>14</sup> Verdussen could clearly support himself and his family without diversifying his corpus, but Van Laerhoven does note that Verdussen paid the rent on his shop much more irregularly from 1645 to 1667 than he did in the 1630s.<sup>15</sup>

The Habsburg authorities in Brabant were evidently pleased with Verdussen's Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe. In 1654 Willem Verdussen's licence was renewed by the Council of Brabant without limitation.<sup>16</sup> While the newspaper did not feature any advertisements for books or commercial goods and services, public announcements were placed by the authorities on several occasions—regarding thefts, the sale of maritime prizes and the announcement of a new ordinance.<sup>17</sup>

By the 1650s Willem Verdussen was ageing, and he was undoubtedly assisted in the publication of the Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe by a number of his twelve children.<sup>18</sup> In 1661, when Willem was sixty-eight or sixty-nine years old, the courantier passed the rights of the newspaper to his son Peter (1620–1677); the licence was renewed under 10 Arblaster, From Ghent to Aix, p. 184.

11 See chapter 12.

12 English newspapers proved an exception: from the second half of the seventeenth century they were often numbered continuously without the sequence ending at the end of the year.

Peter's name, again without a date of termination.<sup>19</sup> Peter continued to place his father's name on the newspaper (instead of his own) until Willem died in 1667.

The surviving issues published by Peter in the 1660s suggests that the heir to the business was keeping up with the times. From 1661 onwards the periodicity of the Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe was strictly observed, with issues appearing on Tuesdays and Fridays only. The number of reports increased: Peter Verdussen usually published around fourteen or fifteen reports, whereas his father had presented an average of nine reports. Peter Verdussen maintained a network centred on Naples, Rome, Venice, Warsaw, Danzig, Vienna, Hamburg, Copenhagen, The Hague, Amsterdam and London.

Peter Verdussen died in 1677, but his siblings were ready to carry on the venture. The licence was again renewed in 1678 under the late Peter's name—the publisher behind this renewal was most likely younger brother Hendrik (1632–1684). When Hendrik passed away in 1684, his sisters

Maria (1618–1691) and Clara (1623–1695) ensured that the newspaper was continued.<sup>20</sup> By 1691 they had rebranded the newspaper as the Antwerpsche Post-Tijdinge, appearing on Tuesdays and Fridays as a folded quarto pamphlet of four unnumbered pages.<sup>21</sup> The family business only came to an end in 1695, when the publisher Hendrik (III) Aertssens (1661–1741), a distant relation of the Verdussens, purchased the rights of the newspaper.

NB.

The title of the newspaper was alternatively spelled as Extraordinaris Post-tijdinghen, Extraordinaris Post-Tijdinge, and Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinge. From 1669 the newspaper also carried the name of the day of publication: Vrijdaghe Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinge and Dijnsdaghe Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinge.

Due to the erratic numbering system and irregular dates of publication I have chosen not to infer any lost issues for Verdussen's Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe.

Den Ordinarissen Postilioen

Antwerp, 1635–1678

The fall of Abraham Verhoeven as privileged courantier of the Habsburg Netherlands encouraged a revival in the Antwerp news industry. By April 1635 Willem Verdussen (1592–1667) was publishing the bi-weekly Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe.<sup>1</sup> At the end of the same year Verdussen was joined as courantier by Martin Binnart (c. 1590–1652/1653). On 22 November Binnart paid the Council of Brabant in Brussels 13 gulden and 10 stuivers for a licence to “print gazettes and new tidings”.<sup>2</sup> While most authorities (and news publishers) throughout Europe sought to restrict local competition in the news market, the Habsburg authorities in Brabant evidently had no such reservations in 1635. A year earlier the citizens of Antwerp had been served only by the struggling Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c. of Verhoeven; now they could choose between two brand new ventures. The transformation of the Antwerp news market was a symbolic assertion of the importance of the city in the European news network. Here news could be received, produced and sold in quantities substantial enough for two competing titles.

Martin Binnart’s newspaper, Den Ordinarissen Postilioen, must have appeared shortly before or after the payment for his licence in 1635, but the earliest surviving issue dates from 21 April 1637. While Binnart, and later his widow and son, would publish the newspaper until at least 1678, it has suffered an extraordinary rate of loss. Only 23 issues have survived—less than one surviving issue per year of publication. The surviving issues are spread between collections in Bruges (eight issues), Stockholm (six issues), Paris (four issues), Antwerp (four issues) and Zámorsk (one issue).

It seems that Binnart intended to publish Den Ordinarissen Postilioen as a bi-weekly newspaper on Tuesdays and Fridays, like his local rival Verdussen. However, the surviving issues dated from 1637, 1638 and 1639 suggest that while Binnart published regularly on Fridays, his newspaper appeared only occasionally on Tuesdays. In 1639 he probably published just under seventy issues—hardly a bi-weekly newspaper. Only by the early 1640s does Den Ordinarissen Postilioen seem to have settled to a more regular rhythm. The few surviving issues indicate that by the end of 1645 Binnart switched to Wednesdays and Saturdays as his preferred dates of publication; by the mid-1650s Binnart’s widow, Maria Strang (?–1674), likely returned to the original schedule of Tuesdays and Fridays.

Den Ordinarissen Postilioen appeared as an unfolded double-sided folio leaf, in the style pioneered by the Amsterdam newspapers two decades earlier. This format had also been adopted by Willem Verdussen; the two new Antwerp courantiers clearly did not wish to emulate Abraham Verhoeven’s illustrated pamphlet style which had defined Antwerp’s contribution to the development of the news industry for the last fifteen years.

Before Martin Binnart became a courantier at the relatively advanced age of forty-five, he had enjoyed a long career in both the scholarly world and the Antwerp book trade. This early career has been the subject of intensive research by Steven van Impe.<sup>3</sup> Binnart was originally from Eisenach, in Electoral Saxony. He attended the (strictly Lutheran) university of Jena, where he defended a thesis in support of the arguments of Thomas Sagittarius, professor of logic, in 1610.<sup>4</sup> By 1612, however, Binnart was in Antwerp, where he worked as a proof-reader in the Plantin-Moretus firm. Binnart probably converted to Catholicism; while working in the Plantin-Moretus offices, he was employed as a translator for the Antwerp Jesuit Andreas Schottus.<sup>5</sup> During these years Binnart was also active as an independent scholar, compiling a Dutch-Latin dictionary that was published in at least twenty-eight editions between the 1620s and 1744.<sup>6</sup>

Binnart’s career at the Plantin-Moretus offices came to an end in the mid-1630s, when he established himself as a printer and bookseller in the Hoogstraat. He now devoted himself to the news market. A reconstruction of Binnart’s corpus as printer suggests that he rarely published works longer than a few sheets.<sup>7</sup> Almost all his surviving works are short news pamphlets of one sheet or less, most celebrating Habsburg victories in the Low Countries and Germany. These ephemeral publications were suitable supplements to the core business of Binnart's career: the cultivation of a news network and the publication of Den Ordinarissen Postilioen. Binnart also offered a French translation of his newspaper: Le Postillon Ordinaire.<sup>8</sup> The French edition was set in a roman rather than a black letter typeface, and usually appeared on the same day as Den Ordinarissen Postilioen, but occasionally one or two days later. Le Postillon Ordinaire was generally a straightforward translation of its Dutch counterpart, but Binnart sometimes left out a more speculative report which was included at the end of Den Ordinarissen Postilioen. With his French translation Binnart was able to target a larger market in the Southern Netherlands, and possibly infiltrate the French market, to this point dominated by the exclusively monopoly of the Paris Gazette.

In his licence application to the Council of Brabant on 20 May 1635 Binnart specified that he was able to solicit regular despatches from Catholic correspondents in Vienna, Cologne, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Münster and Paris. When renewing his licence in 1648 Binnart disclosed that many of these correspondents were postmasters.<sup>9</sup> The few surviving issues of Binnart's Flemish and French newspapers demonstrate that he concentrated on the German heartland and other places served by the German postal system. Binnart certainly made use of his connections with his birthplace, Eisenach, and the wider Saxon region. Binnart presented few reports from Italy and France, and rarely anything from the British Isles, the Iberian Peninsula or the Baltic. While the substantial rate of loss limits a comparison between Binnart and his local rival Verdussen, it does appear that Verdussen had the upper hand. Verdussen's Extraordinarisse Post-tijdinghe often included reports from Rome and Venice, and Verdussen also cultivated the same German networks as Binnart.

Binnart's news venture seems to have had limited success. Den Ordinarissen Postilioen rarely featured more than ten reports per issue, and contained around 1,100–1,300 words—the Amsterdam newspapers of the same period managed over 2,000 words per issue.<sup>10</sup> Binnart was often unable to fill the entire issue, leaving a considerable amount of white space on the rear side; sometimes he used large gaps between reports to bulk out the page. Den Ordinarissen Postilioen featured large roman headers for its datelines—a visually pleasing aspect, but further limiting the news content. As far as surviving issues can tell us Den Ordinarissen Postilioen never contained any advertisements or public announcements.<sup>11</sup>

In 1648, when he renewed his licence as courantier, Binnart petitioned the Council of Brabant for a subsidy. Business was tough; now that the peace of Westphalia had been signed, fewer people desired to buy his newspaper.<sup>12</sup> The end of the Thirty Years' War did not of course end the fighting completely. The Spanish Habsburgs continued to struggle against France until 1659, while war would soon erupt between England and the Dutch Republic, and later in the Baltic. But perhaps Binnart was not in the right position to profit from these new theatres of conflict—his network of correspondents and business connections had always focussed on Germany.

Binnart died at the end of 1652 or early in 1653. His eldest son Peeter did not want to take over the business, and it was Binnart's widow, Maria Strang, who continued to print and publish Den Ordinarissen Postilioen until her death in 1674. She renewed Binnart's privilege in her own name in 1658 and 1668; each time she was granted a ten-year licence—unlike her rivals, the Verdussens, who received unlimited licences for their newspaper when renewed in 1654 (in name of Willem Verdussen) and 1661 (in name of Peter Verdussen).<sup>13</sup> This favouritism may have inspired Peter Verdussen to demand even greater privilege: in 1674 he challenged the licence of Maria Strang at the Council of Brabant, arguing that he was the rightful courantier of Antwerp. This challenge was rejected by the Council of Brabant, on the grounds that the licence of the widow was valid for four more years.<sup>14</sup>

Maria Strang died soon after this challenge to her position. It seems that for the remainder of the licence her son Martin (II) Binnart (1630–?) continued in her place—in 1678 the newspaper was printed by Jacobus Bodt “for the heirs of Martin Binnart”.<sup>15</sup> In all likelihood Den Ordinarissen Postilioen disappeared shortly afterwards. The Binnart name lived on mainly through the success of Martin Binnart's Latin-Dutch dictionary, widely printed in both the Southern Netherlands and the Dutch Republic. As a result, even after Binnart's death and the demise of his newspaper, the average Dutch newspaper reader could still find his name in the advertising columns of their weekly issues.<sup>16</sup>

10 Den Ordinarissen Postilioen featured an average of 8.6 reports per issue (I inspected twenty out of twenty-three surviving issues).

NB.

The title of the newspaper was alternatively spelled as Den ordinarissen Postilioen or Den Ordinarissen Postillion while Martin Binnart was its publisher. Under his widow the title became Extraordinarisse Wekelijcke Post-tijdinghen uyt geheel Europa ende de andere Quartieren and later Ordinarissche wekelijcke Post-tijdinge.

Due to the patchy survival of Den Ordinarissen Postilioen and its irregular dates of publication, I have chosen to infer lost issues only for the years 1642, 1644 and 1646.

Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheyde ghewesten Bruges, 1637–1660

For much of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, Bruges, one of the main towns of the region of Flanders, could plausibly also claim to be one of Europe's commercial capitals. From these dizzy heights Bruges's fortunes waned in the sixteenth century. By 1600 its population had halved from its medieval peak, declining from close to 50,000 to around 25,000. The commercial and urban decline of Bruges was accelerated by the dominance of nearby Antwerp as the new trade centre of the world. The Dutch Revolt would destroy Antwerp's hegemony, and offer Bruges the prospect of an unexpected revival. The closing of the river Scheldt by Dutch rebels, the main artery of Antwerp's wealth, offered new opportunities to Bruges and its inhabitants, connected to the North Sea via a natural canal. In the early seventeenth century economic renewal was supported by the spiritual and political regeneration taking place across the Habsburg Netherlands, and the population of Bruges would increase up to around 35,000 by the end of the century.<sup>1</sup> The mercantile revival, growing population, and rich urban culture of Bruges would also nurture a lively commercial news culture in the city and encourage the emergence of several newspapers. During the course of the seventeenth century at least four different newspapers would be published in Bruges, three of them competing against one another in the 1660s.<sup>2</sup>

The first Bruges newspaperman was Nicolaes Breyghel (?–1669), the printer and publisher of the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheyde ghewesten.<sup>3</sup> Breyghel was originally from Cologne, but moved to Antwerp in the early 1620s. He became a citizen of Antwerp in 1624, and entered the local St Luke's guild as a bookseller. Shortly thereafter, in 1625, Breyghel was induced to move to Bruges, probably at the behest of the city council; Breyghel would be reimbursed a couple years later by the magistrates for the costs of his move.<sup>4</sup> In 1625 Bruges, although a substantial city, only had one print shop, managed by Willem de Neve (fl. 1610–c. 1663). Evidently the magistrates were eager to stimulate the local print business with new talent: Willem de Neve's extant publications do not suggest a sophisticated operation.

In 1627 Breyghel moved to the Philipstockstraat, living next to the grounds of the St Donatus cathedral, located on the central Burgh.<sup>5</sup> From here Breyghel managed a busy shop. He published a large variety of devotional tracts, and his services were frequently required by the magistrates for the printing of ordinances and other jobbing work.<sup>6</sup> The Bruges book trade would grow in the 1630s and 1640s to accommodate new talent, but Breyghel seems to have remained a respected member of the industry. He held the position of deacon of the booksellers' guild in 1640, 1647 and 1658, and of governor of the guild in 1642, 1646 and 1657.<sup>7</sup>

During his brief stay in Antwerp in the early 1620s Breyghel would undoubtedly have encountered Abraham Verhoeven's Nieuwe Tijdinghen—then a real innovation, and a political success.<sup>8</sup> But Verhoeven's illustrated pamphlets would not inspire Breyghel's own newspaper. Rather, when Breyghel started the first Bruges newspaper he looked towards the newspapers published by Willem Verdussen and Martin Binnart in Antwerp from 1635 onwards, and further afield, to Amsterdam, where Jan van Hilten and Broer Jansz had published printed serials since the later 1610s. The title of Breyghel's paper, the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheyde ghewesten, imitated Broer Jansz's Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren. The structure and lay-out of the first Bruges paper was closely modelled on the Amsterdam and Antwerp newspapers as well: published as a double-sided folio (a half-sheet of paper). Breyghel used a black letter typeface for the content of his news reports, complemented with civilité and roman typefaces for headers and datelines. Breyghel also frequently used large woodcut initials for the first report on each issue. The only resemblance to Abraham Verhoeven's Nieuwe Tijdinghen was a woodcut border around and between the news columns on the front and back of the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten, a feature not found on other Dutch or Flemish newspapers.

The earliest extant issue of the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten dates from 24 March 1637. From 1637 to 1654 eighty-six issues (including two special issues) of Breyghel's newspaper have survived, the vast majority in a single volume in the municipal library in Bruges. This includes a near-complete run of issues dated from 1644, but not a single issue from 1639, 1641, 1646, 1647 and 1649–1653. It is uncertain when Breyghel started his newspaper. I consider it likely that he may have done so shortly before or after Willem Verdussen and Martin Binnart started their newspapers in Antwerp in 1635. The resemblance to their newspapers is canny, and the new courantiërs are likely to have copied the design and structure of their colleagues' newspapers. Verdussen and Binnart commenced their ventures soon after the end of Abraham Verhoeven's privileged position as the only newspaperman of the Southern Netherlands. The new Antwerp courantiërs both applied for licences from the Council of Brabant. Breyghel would have known that these licences held no validity in Flanders. With Verhoeven out of the picture, and Verdussen's and Binnart's privileges restricted to Brabant, Breyghel would find no obstructions to his publication. It is noteworthy that Breyghel published the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten without a licence from the Council of Flanders or the Privy Council in Brussels. This was not illegal, but it meant Breyghel did not enjoy the same legal protection as Binnart and Verdussen. It is most likely that Breyghel received informal acknowledgement or support from the local magistrates to undertake the publication of a newspaper.

Unlike his Antwerp competitors, who aimed to publish their newspapers twice a week (but did not do so regularly during the 1630s), Breyghel's Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten appeared weekly, usually on Tuesdays. This was not a strict schedule: occasionally the newspaper appeared on Mondays or Wednesdays. Sometimes Breyghel printed an additional issue later in the week, on Fridays or Saturdays, and sometimes he missed a week altogether. Altogether Breyghel printed around 50 to 55 issues each year.

Breyghel sustained a small but very reliable network of correspondents. He usually presented around seven reports each week, in an issue composed of 1,300–1,700 words. His main news sources were located in Vienna, Cologne and Hamburg, but the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten also included at least one Italian report each week (usually from Rome, Milan or Venice). Sometimes he offered news from Leipzig, Frankfurt or Prague, and Breyghel also had access to a range of local sources, in Antwerp, Dunkirk, Ostend and Lille. Breyghel regularly included reports sourced directly from London; still a relative novelty in the 1630s and 1640s. At this time only British news specialists, like Jan van Hilten and Joost Broersz in Amsterdam, were able to provide such direct coverage of the English Civil Wars. Undoubtedly the proximity of Bruges to the English coast and the large English mercantile community in the town provided Breyghel with unusually good sources for British news.

Breyghel complemented his network of correspondents with news from the "Brusselsche Gazette". Each week around half or a third of the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten would consist of news reports gathered by the writer of this otherwise unknown news service. In all likelihood the Brussels gazette was a regular manuscript news service, rather than an unknown printed newspaper. It is certain, however, that Breyghel also made use of other newspapers printed during this time. On at least one occasion Breyghel copied a report from Jan van Hilten's Amsterdam Courante uyt Italien, Duytslandt, &c: the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten from 7 September 1638 contained the dateline "copy of a letter from Emmerich from 28 August, printed by Jan van Hilten".<sup>9</sup> Amsterdam newspapers like those of Van Hilten certainly circulated in Bruges. The volume in the municipal library in Bruges which contains eighty-four issues of Breyghel's newspaper also includes issues of Jan van Hilten's Courante uyt Italien, Broer Jansz's Tydinghen uyt verscheide Quartieren and French Nouvelles de divers Quartiers and Joost Broersz's Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante.

The Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten was a newspaper aimed at a local audience. The newspaper would struggle to compete in a wider market with its limited range of news reports. Breyghel had no qualms about relying for the majority of his news on a Brussels news service: Bruges was no longer the centre of the world, and the courantiër would be disingenuous if he pretended otherwise. Instead the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten could offer a decent digest of international affairs to the curious citizens of Bruges, a step further removed from the political hubbub of Brussels, The Hague or Amsterdam. Breyghel's paper also provided a commercial service to the mercantile community. The two public announcements found in extant copies of the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheide ghewesten concern the sale by the Admiralty of Dunkirk of tobacco, cloth, wine, indigo, anchovies, calfskins, and many other goods taken from Dutch prizes.<sup>10</sup>

Even if Breyghel's newspaper was intended as a local service, the weekly paper did, however, find its way further afield. Marcus Zuerius van Boxhorn, professor of rhetoric at Leiden, referred to Breyghel and his newspaper in a pamphlet in 1647.<sup>11</sup> In the Bediedinge van de tot noch toe onbekende afgodinne Nehalennia Van Boxhorn attacked reverence of the Holy Virgin Mary as a superstitious fancy, maintained only by the corruption of the Catholic Church. As an example Van Boxhorn cited a report from the "courantier of Bruges", who had published in the latest issue of his newspaper a letter from Middelburg, which notified readers of the discovery of several statues of the Virgin Mary on a beach in Zeeland—statues which had been smashed and dumped at sea on the orders of Dutch Reformed ministers.<sup>12</sup> The reappearance of the statues was clear evidence of the miraculous powers of the Virgin. Alas, Van Boxhorn sighed: "this newspaper is censored, that is, permitted to be printed only because there is nothing in there which contradicts the Holy Roman Catholic faith. Unbelievable!"<sup>13</sup>

Nicolaes Breyghel died on 17 April 1669, but the final surviving issue of the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheyde ghewesten dates from 1 July 1654.<sup>14</sup> Breyghel managed his print shop on the Philipstockstraat until at least 1666. How long did Breyghel maintain his periodical venture? Up to 1660 Breyghel is mentioned in the municipal accounts of Bruges for the delivery of newspapers, ordinances and stationery.<sup>15</sup> It is possible that the payments concern the supply of newspapers from Antwerp, Amsterdam or elsewhere, but I consider it more likely that Breyghel continued to publish the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheyde ghewesten up until this point. Certainly, Bruges would not be without a local periodical press when Breyghel did cease publication. By the mid-1660s three different courantiers published weekly papers.<sup>16</sup> All three would model their titles and designs on Breyghel's Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheyde ghewesten.

NB.

Due to the irregular publication of the Nieuwe Tydinghen uyt verscheyde ghewesten I have chosen to infer lost issues only for the years 1637, 1640 and 1644.

Extraordinarisse Post tijdinge Antwerp, 1637

Isaac Verhoeven (1607–1637) was the second son of Abraham Verhoeven (1575–1652), and had bought his father's shop, including all its material and stock, in September 1634. For a short while Isaac continued to publish his father's newspaper, the Courante uyt Duytschlandt, &c., while his ageing and sickly father helped out in the shop.<sup>1</sup> At the death of Isaac on 19 February 1637, his premises, the "Gulde Handt" (Golden Hand), reverted to his destitute and indebted father. This did not go unnoticed to Abraham's creditors; the property and its contents were auctioned off on 3 April 1637.<sup>2</sup>

Isaac's widow, Catharina Hamers (?–1678), was determined not to relinquish the business without a struggle. After the auction she bought back the type and press, and moved to the "Gulde Sonne" (Golden Sun), the original premises of Abraham Verhoeven where her father-in-law was living once more. In the "Gulde Sonne" Catharina tried to sustain the traditional role of the Verhoeven family in the news market. Within a couple of weeks she was publishing a newspaper. One issue, dated from 24 April 1637, has survived.

This newspaper, the Extraordinarisse Post tijdinge, was a valiant attempt to recover the former position of the Verhoevens in the Antwerp book trade. However, it would prove to be too late. In 1635 two new Antwerp courantiërs had come to the fore: Willem Verdussen and Martin Binnart. Probably inspired by the decline of Abraham Verhoeven's ventures, the Antwerp publishers appealed for licenses to the Council of Brabant to print a newspaper; both were successful. Verdussen's Extraordinarisse Post

tijdinghe and Binnart's Den Ordinariissen Postilioen and its French translation, Le Postillon Ordinaire, appeared once or twice a week from 1635 onwards.<sup>3</sup>

It seems that Catharina Hamers looked to these newspapers for inspiration; her issue of Friday 24 April appeared on the same day as her colleagues, while her title was near-identical to Verdussen's newspaper. The style and format of Hamers' Extraordinarisse Post tijdinge was a double-sided folio leaf, with reports printed in double columns—again, closely modelled on Verdussen and Binnart. Hamers' issue of 24 April contained reports from Genoa, Venice, Paris, Mainz, Munich, Leipzig and Liège, but Verdussen and Binnart's papers of the same date presented more: Verdussen's issue featured reports from Venice, Vienna, Oberland, Augsburg, Speyer, Meinungen, Franconia and Liège along with two reports from both Dresden and Leipzig, while Binnart's issue contained news from Altenburg, Leipzig, Meissen, Dresden, Marburg, Thuringia, Frankfurt and Dunkirk, along with two reports from Venice.<sup>4</sup> Catharina Hamers clearly invested in her own network of correspondents and news sources, but it was tough going against her two competitors, both by this point well entrenched in the Antwerp news trade.

Hamers' Extraordinarisse Post tijdinge is unlikely to have lasted long. While the widow lived on a further forty years, dying only in 1678, an inquiry by the Habsburg Privy Council in 1642 revealed only Verdussen and Binnart as active newspapermen.<sup>5</sup> The Verhoeven dynasty had come to a quiet end.

<sup>4</sup> Luckily both issues by Verdussen and Binnart of this date have survived: Extraordinaris Post-tijdinghen des Iaers 1637. den 24. April. Nom. 33. 24.04.1637, and Anno 1637. Den ordinariissen Postilioen. Num. 17. 24.04.1637.

Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante Amsterdam, 1638–1669

In the early 1620s, only a few years after the birth of the Dutch press, Amsterdam was a true news centre. In 1619 Amsterdam was the only European city with two competing weekly newspapers; and in 1620 Amsterdam courantiërs would be the first to publish French and English newspapers. Two rival newsmen, Broer Jansz and Jan van Hilten, would dominate the Dutch news market until the Amsterdam newspaper trade went through a second wave of expansion in the later 1630s and early 1640s.<sup>1</sup> During this period the two established figures were joined by four other newspapermen. In 1645 these six produced a total of ten newspaper issues each week. This level of production would not be surpassed by any other European city until the end of the seventeenth century.

The first entrepreneur of the second generation of Amsterdam newspapermen was François Lieshout (c. 1596–1646).<sup>2</sup> Lieshout was a newsman through and through. From 1625 onwards he was active as a publisher and bookseller on the Dam, in “t Groot Boeck” (the large book). Like his rival Jan van Hilten, Lieshout did not own a printing press. But unlike Van Hilten, who diversified his business interests, Lieshout specialised exclusively in the publication of news. His extant corpus is comprised of over fifty news pamphlets and illustrated broadsheets, but only a couple of devotional texts (published in the early 1640s, later in his career).<sup>3</sup> When Lieshout started a weekly newspaper in June 1638 he was an established newsman, and one of the most prominent players in the industry. He had been able to build up an extensive news network, and it is likely that Lieshout was actively labouring during these early years towards the launch of a newspaper. Already in 1635 Lieshout published a broadsheet with newspaper-style reports from Duisburg, Nijmegen, Zürich and Lille.<sup>4</sup> publishing his newspaper as a half-sheet folio leaf, printed on both sides with four columns of reports. This was the presentation which most Dutch readers now expected of their weekly paper, and Lieshout did not seek to challenge that standard.

A total of 276 issues of the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante have survived from 1638 to 1669. This represents just over 20% of the total likely production of the newspaper.<sup>6</sup> Most extant issues can be found in Stockholm (158 issues); others are located in collections in Oldenburg and Paris, and in smaller numbers in Amsterdam, Dresden, Hannover, The Hague, Uppsala, Princeton, Kew, Copenhagen, Haarlem, Moscow and Leiden. Only twenty-six issues survive in two copies or more.

It was no coincidence that Lieshout chose Tuesday as the day of publication for his newspaper. As an experienced newsman, he knew his market very well. In 1638 the two available Amsterdam weeklies appeared on Saturdays. Lieshout shrewdly distanced himself from the existing rivalry between Jan van Hilten and Broer Jansz, offering a mid-week issue. He initially called his newspaper the Extra-ordinaire Courante, but by 1639 it was known as the Extra-ordinaire of Middel-weeckse Courante. The concept of a mid-week newspaper was no longer ‘extraordinary’ by 1640—henceforth the newspaper was known simply as the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante. Now Lieshout’s venture too was an established fixture in the news market, a sign that there was indeed room for a third periodical in Amsterdam.

The idea of a mid-week newspaper resonated so well with the reading public that Lieshout did not have Tuesday to himself for long. Already by the end of 1638 the Amsterdam printer and publisher Joost Broersz, a son of Broer Jansz, joined the market with his Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante.<sup>7</sup> The additional competition may have affected the sales of the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante, but it certainly did not discourage advertisers. By the later 1640s every single issue of the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante featured at least one advertisement or public announcement. Advertising booksellers would often place an advertisement in the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante and the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante on the same day; a sure sign that they were confident that the two Tuesday papers would reach a broad range of customers.

Lieshout was around fifty years old when he died on 29 October 1646. His widow, Sara Vlaminc (c. 1600–1669), took over the shop and the newspaper—the issue of 30 October 1646 already bears her name rather than that of her late husband. Vlaminc would publish the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante until her death at the end of December 1669. She never strayed from the business model established by her husband in the 1620s and 1630s, and concentrated exclusively on the publication and sale of news.

Sara Vlaminc was determined to keep the business going, but the fortunes of her newspaper declined in the 1650s and 1660s, as a comparison with the other available Amsterdam newspapers makes clear. The Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante contained on average eleven reports per issue between 1638 and 1669.<sup>8</sup> In the 1640s, this was similar to most other Amsterdam titles. Twenty years later, the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante had changed little and had fallen behind the times. Johannes (III) van Ravesteyn, who took over the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante in 1661, published on average 18.5 reports per issue in the 1660s.<sup>9</sup> Otto Barentsz Smient, the successor of Jan van Hilten, regularly presented more than twenty reports in his Courante uyt Italien.<sup>10</sup>

The contrast was also apparent in the disparity between the news networks maintained by Sara Vlaminc and her competitors. Vlaminc had good connections in France and England, offering regular reports from Paris and London and from provincial and maritime centres in both countries. She also presented in every issue two or three reports from the Italian Peninsula (often from Naples, Rome, Genoa or Venice), and two reports from the Holy Roman Empire (usually from Cologne, Frankfurt, Nuremberg or the river Rhine). Throughout the 1650s and 1660s the other Amsterdam courantiers were able to offer much more news from the Iberian Peninsula, Poland, the Baltic region and the Holy Roman Empire. Late into the 1660s Vlaminc continued to fill a significant portion of her newspaper issues with “domestic” news, or undated reports and speculations below a line break in the text. This practice was becoming increasingly outdated, and most newspapers, including new titles in Haarlem, The Hague, Utrecht and Rotterdam, abandoned it.

The differences between the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante and the other Amsterdam newspapers became even more apparent when, in 1654, the Amsterdam burgomasters effected a fundamental reorganisation of the provision of news. In this year the four remaining courantiers were ordered to share publication days, rather than compete against one another. The Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante and the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante were to publish alternatively on Tuesday, sharing the same numbering sequence, and the Courante uyt Italien and the Tijdinghen uyt verscheyde Quartieren were to do the same on Saturday. Their editors did not, however, take this opportunity to pool resources, but instead continued to operate as independent ventures. The reader who subscribed to all newspapers would not receive the same quantity or quality of news every single week.

Sara Vlaminc was buried on 27 December 1669, and with her the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante came to an end. Even so, the difficulties she experienced would not deter her son-in-law, Matheus Cousaert (1630–1689) from continuing the family tradition in the news trade.<sup>11</sup> From the start of 1670 he was one of four Amsterdam courantiers who published the Amsterdamsche Courant.<sup>12</sup> Cousaert would publish an issue of this co-operative venture every other Tuesday, as Sara Vlaminc had published the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante since 1654. It is likely that Cousaert had gained plenty of experience in his mother-in-law’s shop, together with his wife, Judithje Lieshout, and he may have had a hand in running the shop in Vlaminc’s final years. To the Amsterdam burgomasters, he will have been a reliable candidate for the position as courantier of the new conglomerated periodical venture.

NB.

The title of the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante was initially Extra-ordinaire Courante (1638), then Extra-ordinaire of Middel-weeckse Courante (1639); from 1665 it was spelled as Ordinarise Middelweeckse Courante, and in 1669 as Ordinaris Middel-weeckse Courante.

The first issue of 1648 was published on 31 December 1647, the first issue of 1649 appeared on 29 December 1648, and the first issue of 1653 appeared on 31 December 1652.

In 1656, 1657, 1658 and 1666, whilst alternating publication with the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante, the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante was systematically misnumbered with an odd sequence (1–51) instead of an even sequence (2–52). The inferred issues are therefore also inferred with the erroneous sequence.

The second issue of the Ordinarise Middel-weeckse Courante of 1655 (numbered 4) did not appear; instead it was published by Willemijntje Broersz of the Ordinaris Dingsdaegsche Courante under her title.<sup>13</sup>
